A great city, a great governor, a little band of men and women who believed in a great Saviour! This is the story of the eighteenth chapter of the Acts. Aquila, Priscilla, Apollos, Paul, Timothy and Silas were leaving impressions upon civilization which have never been effaced. Notice again how they won their victories. Paul lived so near to Jesus that he would talk with him in the night. Aquila and Priscilla lived so near to him that they could lead the young Apollos to the fuller richness of his love. Apollos followed the new light so joyously, so fully, that he led many others to acknowledge the Saviour. Some scholars have even held that it was none other than this young Apollos who wrote the wonderful Epistle to the Hebrews, presenting to the Jewish Christians the unanswerable arguments for the Messiahship of Jesus, and showing them the splendors of the new Temple of Holiness into which their faith in him had led them.

siasm: Its Value. How to Cultivate It

ian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Isa. 12 : 1-6.

C RTAIN fanciful problems have been bothering scientists and make-believe scientists for many gener- s. Perpetual motion is one of and has been pretty generally doned now. You can't keep a going forever without supply- w energy. Abiogenesis is another se problems—that is the problem oducing life without antecedent The farmer is fond of putting all impossible efforts into one terse ism, and saying they are like a trying to lift himself by his own straps.

w to create and produce and culti- real enthusiasm by the effort of will is almost as hopeless as any se other impossible efforts. You t be enthusiastic about anything y by willing to be or wishing to be.

re are all sorts of tricks of pro- g enthusiasm among crowds— known to the politician, the yel- ewspaper and like agencies. En- sm rests upon facts or ideas that the happiness of individuals or s. Enthusiasm rests oftenest upon loyalties. A college boy is en- stic over the success of his col- athletes; a man is enthusiastic he triumph of principles in which lieves. Enthusiasm means real g. We love something; we want hing; we achieve or hope to e something—these are the steps husiasm.

w, religious enthusiasm must spring great and deep religious convic- and religious loyalties. We must rofoundly, desperately, for Christ he things he stands for. And this of enthusiasm comes only by g close to him, by receiving the baptism of his Holy Spirit into uls, by letting him put within our souls his passion for serving and g men.

o the value of enthusiasm, that is ireless. If people are sufficiently siastic they can do anything.

There are two places for the Christian to find enthusiasm—one is in prayer, waiting for the Holy Spirit's fire to fall as it fell upon the disciples at Pentecost; the other out among men, seeing their suffering and their need, and knowing that the power and the program of Christ can meet that need for every soul and for all the world. Then, as we go to work, the enthusiasm grows. When a task is plain don't wait for enthusiasm to come before tackling it. Plunge in, and the enthusiasm will grow as you work.

How Can Our League Make Our Town Better?

Epworth League. Eccl. 9 : 14, 15; I John 3 : 17; Prov. 14 : 21; Ezek. 7 : 23; I Cor. 16 : 13.

OUR League and our Town. Surely there ought to be a vital connection between the two.

But is our town any better because our League is in it?

Here are some ways in which the League can help the town.

By open-air services. Some city Leagues and other young people's societies do heroic Gospel work during the summer season, singing and testifying in the open air.

By visiting sick folks, poor folks, sad folks, old folks, folks in prison, with songs, flowers, gifts.

By providing clean amusement to win other young people away from amusements of the wrong sort.

By cultivating a feeling of real friendliness, making all the young people of the town know that the Christians are interested in them.

By finding out about local issues, and urging fathers and brothers and friends to be on the right side.

By finding out what is wrong in conditions of laborers and their families, and stirring things up till justice is done.

By cooperating with libraries, lyceums, school boards, in lifting the intellectual tone of the neighborhood.

By backing the church and pastor in every way to bring about the spiritual regeneration of the community.

Mitchell MID-YEAR SIX

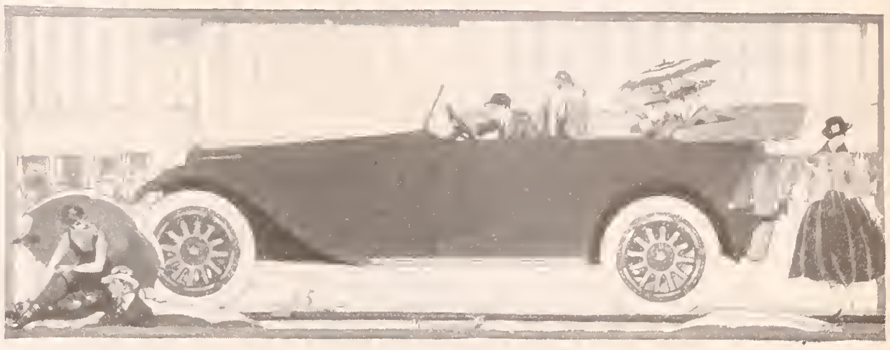
26 Extra Features



John W. Bate's Trouble-Savers

In this Mid-Year Mitchell Mr. Bate has embodied some hundreds of trouble-savers.

You will find here, for instance, a unique and easy control. You will find a power tire pump—an engine primer at the driver's hand.

There is an oversize steering gear, made of Chrome-Vanadium steel. That is for safety. For ease of driving, it is fitted with ball bearings.

There are reversible headlights. There's a tool box under hood.

There is an extra-cost carburetor to save gasoline. There's a light in the tonneau, a locked compartment for valuables. There are Bate cantilever springs in the rear, not one of which has ever broken.

There are 26 such features which are not found in other cars. And most of them are put there to save trouble.

Extra-Strong Parts

Mr. Bate's idea of efficiency is to make every part extra-strong. His margins of safety are at least 50 per cent. But he combines all this strength with light weight.

He uses much Chrome-Vanadium steel. He gets rid of brittle castings. He uses drop forgings and tough steel stampings in 440 parts of the Mitchell. They are three times as strong as castings.

He has worked out in the Mitchell 700 improvements, and most of them aim at endurance. His object is a lifetime car.

Six cars of his building have averaged 164,372 miles each, or more than 30 years of ordinary service. One has run 218,000 miles, and is running still.

Many Costly Attractions

Mr. Bate saves in a thousand ways. Then spends those savings in extra quality, in extra features, in luxuries, beauties and comforts.

With this model plant and its perfect equipment he has cut our factory costs in two. Nowhere else could such a car be built at the Mitchell price.

With these savings he pays for 26 extra features. He gives you a big car, roomy and powerful. He gives you a 22-coat body finish, French-finished leather, 10-inch springs.

In this Mid-Year model—our second for this year—he adds 73 new conceptions. He combines all the best new features in a single car. He gives you the most complete car in existence. He gives you the handsomest touring car built.

All of these things are results of efficiency. We ask you to see them. See for yourself how much it means to get a Bate-built car.

ON New York's Fort George Hill; on Denver's Lookout Mountain; on Philadelphia's Tam-o'-Shanter; on Seattle's Coon Hollow Hill; in Florida's "ball-bearing" sand; in Louisiana's mud and Kansas' "gumbo"; on California's stiffest climbs —side by side with cars of every type — the Hupmobile is proving itself the superior of most, and the equal of any, in power-performance and high-gear work.

It is doing so in actual demonstration demanded by those who invest their good money in motor cars.

In the cities it crawls smoothly along, on high gear, in traffic—without bucking or jerking. It picks up in a twinkling—from a stand to 25 miles an hour in ten seconds.

It is showing that the boasted good points of multi-cylinder performance are simply the good points of Hupmobile performance.

And all at reasonable cost of maintenance. Its four-cylinder simplicity requires neither skilled care nor constant attention.

Are you puzzled by cylinder-claims? Settle the question by challenging the Hupmobile dealer to the hardest test in your neighborhood.

See for yourself how the Hupmobile does the extraordinary with a matter-of-fact, work-a-day ease you have never believed possible in any type of motor car.

With each new Hupmobile the buyer receives, free, a book of coupons. These entitle him to eight monthly inspections and adjustments of his car, and are accepted as cash in payment, at the Hupmobile service station in his home town, or at any other one of more than 5000 authorized service stations in this country and Canada.

Our Girls

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

A YOUNG Greek student, desiring to find out the customs of the United States, became a scholar in one of our Western colleges. It was a co-educational college, and the young man, who had known only the women of his country gentle, retiring women, seldom seen or heard in public was at first embarrassed and then puzzled at the manner and speech of his girl classmates. From the depths of his wondering heart he wrote to an American friend in New York. I am quoting parts of his letter word for word.

"THIS last week has been the best that I have ever had. The reasons are (1) I met a girl that is not frivolous or careless, the only one up to now, a Freshman girl. (2) I have overcome my 'bashfulness' as you called it. (3) I am on more friendly terms with all the boys. I have met all or at most all but two or three. I am somewhat popular, the reason being that though not a single day pass without attacking my moustache and doing all kinds of American jokes, it is I that get most of the fun out of it, instead of getting mad.

"I have finally come, after much hesitation to the final position in regard to girls I am going to hold. The events which brought these changes and decisions about were the Freshman Party and my 'philippic' against girls.

"Now about my Fresh party.

"I went, as you probably expect, without a girl. Then, while everybody there expected somebody else to do or say something, it was I that did most of the cutting. I agreed to have my eyes bound up and try to catch some boy or girl in the room.

"Then I put a table in the middle of the room and a chair on the table and myself on the top and said a Greek poem. Having been recalled by continuous clapping of hands, I went and declaimed in Arabic, while nobody else did such a thing. Then, to cap the climax, I played alone in the middle of the room with perfect success Charlie Chapman, so your term 'bashfulness' does not apply to me any more.

"Then my theme.

"I sigh and laugh when I remember it. It is against the trifling frivolousness of the girls. When Mr. Ellis asked in class for somebody to read his theme, I stood up and read. Before I had gone twenty lines, everybody was howling; boys laughing to tears, girls crying and denying my statements.

"Mr. Ellis said: 'I hand the culprit to you: if he needs hanging, hang him.' Before noon everybody either congratulated or threatened and advised me to 'Be careful.' Dr. Williams, who has been very kind to me, told me that 'What you have done is good for them.' Prof. Ellis said, 'They needed it but there was no one to tell it to them. Never since I have been here has a theme created such a sensation.'

"In the Freshman party last Tuesday we had a game of 'hunting for a wife.' Couples left the gymnasium and were to exchange wife whenever two couples met. My last 'wife' was a tall, rather thoughtful girl, dressed in a decent dress but neither of the 'latest fashion' nor showing arms, neck, shoulders, etc. We were not together for more than four minutes, yet I knew at once that she was a good girl.

"When my theme was read in class she told me she would write an answer. She did and it is one of the few really thoughtful themes I have ever seen. She laid the blame for the girls' frivolousness to the men because 'if a girl were not pleasant when a fellow took her to the movies he would tell the others that she was a stick and nobody would ever take her again anywhere.'

"But the question is why should the girls be afraid of the despise of the boys? Why should they not keep a kind of independence, be above the movies and the shows, subject men not by artificial show of politeness, pleasantness and joyfulness but by their Personality?

"They know that they have strong elements in their characters where we might be weak, feelings and ideals which, as she wrote, 'they have to hide lest they be laughed at.' If they do let them use them they shall really be independent and not get the false show of outward independence.

"If my wife is but an animal, I have the right to whip her. But if she can make me admire her, not her physical self, as unfortunately they try to do, but of her intellectual and her moral self, I might break my head against the wall and cut off my tongue, but I could neither do or say anything unpleasant to her.

"She is the only girl whom I admire. I did not know her four days earlier. She does not know my esteem for her. But I found out that she has a head and uses it. Unfortunately her backbone is not as strong as it ought to be.

"And now my relation to the girls. Two or three times every week I help three or four girls to get their French lesson. In History I have helped another Freshman girl to do a heavy discussion we had. Every time after the lesson is over I say 'Good-bye' and off I go, because they just chatter and I cannot listen to nonsense.

"I am perfectly willing to joke with any girl, the usual joke being my moustache and when shall it be cut off. I am willing to discuss with any girl any question as last night we were discussing co-education (five girls and one boy) and the attitude of girls to boys in school. But I positively cannot just chatter on whether or not it is a fine day or whether or not it is warm and thousands of other questions asked just for the reason of speaking. I do not believe in the use of the tongue when not needed except within reasonable limits of joking or 'being so social.' I cannot for three full half-hours every day in the dining-room keep saying nonsense.

"I have mentioned that I helped a girl to get her history. Then she told me, 'How lovely you are!' This sounds perfectly natural to you probably.

"But it strikes me I don't know how. I am perfectly sure that she did not mean anything. But is this strictly speaking the proper word to use? Would she use it in class?"

HAVE you girls, friends of mine—girls who have written letters to me and girls who are going to write some day—ever stopped to think what a foreigner, not used to your ideals, customs and manner of speech, might think of you? Have you ever wondered how your little slang expressions and your lightest opinions may be taken very seriously and literally? For a foreigner unused to English, unless it is literally translated, might make some very queer mistakes.

The young Greek student thinks that our American girls are weak-minded and spineless. He thinks that they are mere seekers after popularity and flattery. I cannot agree with him, for I know too many girls who are thoughtful and kind—girls who have fine minds and use them in a fine way. I think that he is wrong, fundamentally, but I do think that there is something to be said on his side. I do think that sometimes we are a little careless, in very small ways. I think sometimes that we would avoid certain styles of dressing and mannerisms and even words if we only stopped to think. The pity of it is that sometimes we do not stop to think.

Our land is full of folk who have come to us from foreign countries. Most of them are forming opinions of our nation and our modes of living and our people. I think that our women are the best in the world—but would many foreigners agree with me? The young Greek scholar did not. It is up to you, girls, to make the American standard so high that any observer will know that you are above the calls of popularity and wealth, that you have opinions and the courage to express them, that you have high ideals. If you can make the American standard as high as that, you will not only help the women of our country and the reputation of our country, but help the women of many countries across the sea, women who are looking to us for light.

Here's Something New and Original In an All Year 'Round Car

This announces the latest luxury in fine motor cars—the seven passenger Cole-Springfield Toursedan.

In this exclusive model you get precisely what everyone has been waiting for—a closed car and open car—all in one unit and all for one price.

The roof is permanent. But the windows are removable. Hence, in a minute you can change from an open car to a limousine, or vice versa. No work; no dirt; no fussing.

This is the greatest convenience of the automobile age.

The Cole is the first high grade and only eight cylinder motor car in the world to announce its adoption of the Springfield type all year 'round convertible body.

The new Cole-Springfield bodies are luxuriously constructed, finished and appointed. In addition they embody the convertible feature.

Nothing surpasses them. Nothing is finer. Nothing has more smartness. They represent the very finest closed car workmanship and design.

They combine good taste, rare grace, style and refinement in every line and detail.

This superb Cole-Springfield body mounted on the famous eight cylinder Cole chassis gives you the very last word in a luxurious motor car.

The convenience of the all season body, added to the mechanical efficiency and excellence of the eight cylinder motor, leaves absolutely nothing to be desired.

So for ultra-comfort, ultra-efficiency and all around utility the Cole-Springfield Eight eclipses anything else ever produced.

Demonstrators are on exhibition at Cole dealers now.

The Christian Herald Prayer Leage

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League. All correspondents are specially requested to make their letters as brief as possible. Write requests and acknowledgments on separate sheets.

MRS. M. W. writes from Oklahoma: "Some time ago I asked the League to pray for a young man who was down in sin. I wish to tell you that he has made a great change, and has quit drinking. Please request the Prayer League to pray that he may be wholly strengthened, and that God will use him as an instrument for good." Mrs. M. J. H. writes from Oregon: "I am so rejoiced over the return of my grandson. He was deeply penitent and became reconciled to his wife and returned to his work, a changed man."

A Pastor writes from Canton, Ohio: "Some years ago, while pastor of a mission in Pittsburg, Pa., I was deeply impressed with a sense of the great need in the community. I sent a request to the Prayer League. In the course of a short time I experienced a spirital uplift in my own life. The congregation took on spiritual enthusiasm which steadily increased until a wonderful revival came, that continued for months. Many souls were wonderfully saved. Conviction was deep and conversion clear, and the work was manifestly of God. The Sunday school was more than doubled. The church became too small for the congregation. The spiritual power was wonderful."

A friend from Boston writes: "On May 8, I wrote to you asking your prayers for a missionary who was very ill; and for another who was very tired mentally from overwork, with no one competent to help in her work. I have seen in this week's Christian Herald that my letter was noticed, and wish to say that a letter is just received from the first mentioned, saying that he is recovered, and much better than for years, and is full of hope and courage. The other missionary is improved so that her friends noticed it. She also is full of thanks for God's loving kindness and mercy."

Miss L. C. writes from Cayuta, N. Y.: "Some time ago I asked the prayers of the League for a sister who was in Binghamton State Hospital, and I thank God today that they have been answered, as she is home and her mind restored. Please pray for the conversion of my nephew, my brother and family, and the restoration of my health."

Mrs. J. P. B. writes from Ohio: "I want to tell you that my nephew, for whom I asked prayers, is doing all right and has not touched one drop of liquor for nearly five months." Mrs. E. R. E. writes from Newark, Ohio: "I wrote to the Prayer League some time last winter for you to pray for the recovery of a friend who was not expected to live. She is well and able to do her work. Many thanks for your prayers to our Heavenly Father. He does hear his people. Please pray for my sister, who suffers day and night."

M. E. E. writes from Madison, Ohio: "I wrote you some time ago, asking you to pray that Evangelist Dixon's meetings would be successful. And I am so happy to tell you they were, and that the dear friends I wanted you to pray for have been converted, baptized, and have united with the church. Blessed be the name of the Lord."

Mrs. M. R. writes from Ames, Iowa: "Many times before I have asked you to join me in prayer, and through God's goodness and love, mine and yours have been answered. Again I come to you asking you to pray earnestly for me. I have had a partial stroke of paralysis, which affected my right hand and arm, my mind and speech. There is no help for me except from God. My daughter died a year ago and left two little children for me to care for. Please pray that if it is God's will my health will be restored to me so I may care for the little motherless children."

or there any signs of any important movements in contemplation.

The position of the Austrians on the Austro-Italian front has been considerably changed during the past week, as a result of the Russian activity on the eastern front, which forced the Austrians to withdraw a very large portion of their forces for use against the Russians. A general retreat in the Trentino took place whereby the Italians regained in three or four days ground which it had taken the Austrians many weeks to win.

On Saturday, June 24, the Germans made the most important gain on the northern front of Verdun they have made since the capture by them of Fort Vaux some time ago, and this gain is admitted by the French official bulletin. This consisted of the capture of the French first line trenches between Hills 320 and 321, and the fortified work of Thiaumont. For several weeks the Germans have been endeavoring to possess themselves of this work, which lies almost directly to the east of Bras and a little to the northwest of Fleury. Its capture and retention would give a wedge into the French line from the Meuse to a point south of Damloup to the east, which the French would find very hard indeed to thrust out again. If the Germans hold this position, they would almost certainly advance their line to an east-and-west line drawn through Fleury. The possession of such a line would form a most suitable base from which to launch attacks on the two most northerly of the French second line-of-defense strongholds, Fort de Souville and Fort de Tavannes.

Fleury village was also reached by the Germans, but a very gallant French counter-attack recovered a small portion of this ruined hamlet. At Fleury the Germans are within three and one-half miles of the citadel of Verdun, and are closer thereto than they have been at any time heretofore.

Still farther east a determined but unsuccessful effort was made by the Germans to storm the Damloup battery, south of the village of the same name. The whole of this northern front and also the west were scenes of intense artillery activity.

On the western end of the line between Ypres and the Somme river the British and German artilleries were active all through the week, and there were continual small raids made on each others' positions by the combatants, but was no organized infantry fighting.

The news reports thus far received from this field of operations indicate a concerted and very determined offensive by the British. Over a million shells a day are being sent into the German positions with disastrous effect. So far the action has been almost entirely confined to the artillery.

The Mexican Situation

and is somewhere in the state of Durango with a few followers and is about to reenter the service of Carranza to fight the Gringos. Information which is said to be reliable shows that the Mexican army has available the following equipment: 100,000 Mauser rifles, 50,000 Remington rifles, 50,000 Winchester rifles and about 75 pieces of serviceable field artillery. Ammunition is said to be crossing the border in small quantities, smugglers being still active. No embargo has yet been placed upon the passage of foodstuffs to Mexico. American arsenals are working overtime on the production of ammunition. It was announced on June 7 that the Philadelphia arsenal, the largest in the country, had that day started on a rush order for 20,000,000 rounds of small arms ammunition.

It was reported from Mexico City, June 30, that the Carranza government had issued a memorandum in reply to the American note of June 20, of a defiant character. Other reports indicate the increasing possibility of a peaceable settlement.

On the night of June 30, President Wilson in an address to the Press Club of New York, said some significant things among them the following:

> Of course it is our duty to prepare this nation to take care of its honor and of its institutions. Nobody can debate any part of that, except the detail. Of course it is the duty of the government, which it will never overlook, to defend the rights and people of this country. It goes without saying that it is the duty of the Administration to have constantly in mind with the utmost sensitiveness every point of national honor.
> But gentlemen, after you have said and accepted these obvious things, your program of action is still to be formed. When will you act, and how will you act? The easiest thing is to strike. The brutal thing is the impulsive thing. No man has to think before he takes aggressive action, but before a man really conserves the honor by realizing the ideals of the nation, he has to think exactly what he will do and how he will do it.
> Do you think the glory of America would be enhanced by a war of conquest in Mexico? Do you think that any act of violence by a powerful nation like this against a weak and distracted neighbor would reflect distinction upon the annals of the United States? Do you think that it is our duty to carry self-defense to the point of dictation in the affairs of another people? The ideals of America are written plain upon every page of American history.
> And I want you to know how fully I realize whose servant I am. I do not own the Government of the United States even for the time being. I have no right in the use of it to express my own passions. I have no right to express my own ambitions for the development of America if those ambitions are not coincident with the ambitions of the nation itself. And I have constantly to remind myself that I am not the servant of those who wish to enhance the value of their Mexican investments, but that I am the servant of the rank and file of the people of the United States.
> I get a great many letters, my fellow-citizens, from important and influential men in this country, but I get a great many other letters. I get letters from unknown men from humble women, from people whose names have never been heard and will never be recorded, and there is but one prayer in all of these letters: "Mr. President do not allow anybody to persuade you that the people of this country want war with anybody."
> . . . I am for the time being the spokesman of such people, gentlemen. I have not read history without observing that the greatest forces in the world and the only permanent forces are the moral forces. We have the evidence of a very competent witness, namely the first Napoleon, who said that as he looked back in the last days of his life upon so much as he knew of human history he had to record the judgment that force had never accomplished anything that was permanent.
> Force will not accomplish anything that is permanent, I venture to say in the great struggle which is now going on on the other side of the sea. The permanent things will be accomplished afterwards when the opinion of mankind is brought to bear upon the issues, and the only thing that will hold the world steady is this same silent insistent, all-powerful opinion of mankind.
> Force can sometimes hold things steady until opinion has time to form, but no force that was ever exerted except in response to that opinion was ever a conquering and predominant force. I think the sentence in American history that I myself am proudest of is that the introductory sentences of the Declaration of Independence, where the writers say that a due respect for the opinion of mankind demands that they state the reasons for what they are about to do.
> I venture to say that a decent respect for the opinion of mankind demanded that those who started the present European war should have stated their reasons, but they did not pay any heed to the opinion of mankind, and the reckoning will come when the settlement comes.
> . . . There are some gentlemen who are under the delusion that the power of a nation comes from the top. It does not. It comes from the bottom. The power and virtue of the tree does not come from the blossom and the fruit down into the roots, but it comes from the roots in the obscure passages of the earth where the power is derived which displays itself in the blossom and the fruit; and I know that among the silent, speechless masses of the American people is slowly coming up the great sap of moral purpose and love of justice and reverence for humanity which constitutes the only virtue and distinction of the American people.

There is not a man in America who does not want an Accurate Watch

THE trouble is that there seems to be an eternal hope in the breast of every man that he will be lucky enough to get a cheap watch that will keep good time. It isn't done.

Before you can ever own a truly accurate watch you must make up your mind to pay enough for it. The men you know who carry reliable watches did not get them for the price of a pair of shoes—they paid the price of a good suit of clothes.

Your jeweler will tell you that this is true. Also, when you buy a high grade watch you are guaranteed against disappointment, not only by the maker; but every jeweler cheerfully gives to the buyer of a good watch a lot of service in the way of adjustments, etc., that it would be absurd for him to waste on a poor movement.

In fact no class of dealer in the world gives as much service with a worth-while purchase as the retail jeweler.

How much do you suppose a railroad conductor, engineer or brakeman pays for his watch? Rarely under $25.00. Frequently as high as $75.00.

And these watches are jounced around on trains, subjected to quick changes of heat and cold, shaken up in stops and starts, jolted in "hop offs" and "hop ons"—and still they keep accurate time, year after year. That's because they were good watches to start with. Every two weeks a railroad time inspector checks them up.

Now does it signify anything to you that railroad men who buy their own watches, prefer to buy the Hamilton Watch?

When you are sufficiently weary of a watch that won't keep time, and have made up your mind to buy a real timekeeper to carry for the balance of your life, go to your jeweler and tell him so.

He will show you Hamilton Watches at $25.00, $28.00, $32.50, $50.00, $60.00, $70.00 up to $150.00 for the Hamilton Masterpiece in 18k heavy gold case. He can sell you Hamilton movements alone to fit your present watch case for as low as $12.25 ($13.00 in Canada) and they are accurate, guaranteed watches with the price in plain figures on the box. If you want to know more of the simple logic of buying a good watch

Write for the Hamilton Watch Book "The Timekeeper"

It shows all Hamilton Models for men and women, explains the meanings of technical watch terms and throws a flood of light on the problem of buying and owning a watch that will really keep accurate time.

Smiles Mean Comfort Frowns Mean Corns

Dainty footwear develops corns. One hardly can avoid them.

But what you can do is to end them before they pain you twice. Apply a Blue-jay plaster. Wear what you will then, and the corn won't hurt. In 48 hours it will disappear for good.

Painful corns are needless since Blue-jay was invented. Stop paring them. Stop using ancient treatments. Use the gentle, modern, scientific Blue-jay. Millions of people keep free from corns in that way. Your own friends and neighbors do it. Don't let corns spoil your happiest hours when a little Blue-jay ends them.

The Public School a Free Clinic

SOME years ago it was discovered that many children who were thought dull in their work in school were merely suffering from short sight, which could be corrected in some cases by seating them nearer the boards, and in the more serious cases by proper glasses. This fact once discovered, we were not satisfied until the school authorities had provided for free examination of the eyes of all children and for recommendations to the parents in line with the established facts. This was in the interest of better work and of better scholarship. But we did not stop there. With the medical men once in touch with the helpless youngsters in the schools, nothing would satisfy them short of making of the whole American public school system one monster clinic on sanitation and physical well-being. In many parts of the country children are now being marshaled before the doctors at regular intervals, and parents, among the uneducated classes, are being influenced by the authority of the school physician to have performed operations which in many cases would have proven unnecessary under proper treatment, and it is hardly in line with true American ideals for the school authorities to take to themselves so much power over the bodies of those whose minds they are charged with training. Not long ago the Chicago Daily News, in its column entitled "A Batch of Smiles," took off the fad for school sanitation in a way which is worth passing on, as follows:

"Now it's time for you to start for school, Reggie, darling. Good-by. No, don't kiss me! How many times must I tell you that kissing is insanitary?

"Oh, child, how could you pat the dog? Now we must sterilize your hands all over again and steam them and then use the antiseptic spray on them. There! Now, here are your antiseptic gloves. Get your hands into them quickly.

"And here's your individual car strap. Be careful not to touch any other.

"Have those shoes been baked since you wore them yesterday? No? Then you must change them. Here's another pair, just out of the oven. And here's your slate, dearie. It's been well boiled and afterward baked.

"Now, remember, put on your rubber gloves when working at the blackboard, and use your own piece of chalk. Be sure to use your own cup to drink from, and here's the antiseptic spray to use on your desk.

"And here are two cubes of germicide and a vaporizer; gargle every even hour from this bottle and sniff this one every odd hour.

"Here's your doctor's certificate in its antiseptic case. Show it to the teacher if he insists on cutting out your tonsils again, and tell him I'm sure your adenoids have not grown again since your operation last week.

"Now, run along, dearie. Don't breathe when the wind is blowing or any dust flying or any people passing. Don't breathe at all if you can help it.

"Good-by. No, don't touch mother's hand—just wave a farewell. But wave away from yourself, not toward you."

"Preach the Gospel" means to proclaim good news. If it is good we must use every means to spread it; and Church Publicity will do that.

EDITORIAL NOTE.—Between 200 and 300 ministers and advertising men from various sections of the country attended the conferences on Church Publicity held in conjunction with the convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, in Philadelphia, June 25-30. Some of the speakers traveled hundreds of miles to address these conferences. Each speech was born of experience and study. There was not one dissenting voice heard to the proposition finally made that the conference assume permanent form as a Commission on Church Advertising and Publicity in order to bring to the whole church the benefits of the best modern advertising methods.

The Convention and the conferences on Church Publicity closed too late to permit of an adequate report in this number of the Christian Herald. Such a report, therefore, is reserved for an early succeeding number, and will cover the Convention as a whole with particular attention to the hurch publicity movement.

The latter conference, after aniz- ing as a permanent Commission, cted Rev. Christian F. Reisner of Ne York President; Mr. George C. Sh e of Philadelphia, First Vice-Presiden Wal- ter W. Cribbins of California d W. Frank McClure of Illinois, Seco and Third Vice-Presidents. Rev. aniel E. Weigle, pastor of the Messia Luth- eran Church, Philadelphia, wa made Secretary, and Rev. Samuel D Price, pastor of Calvary Presbyterian urch, Camden, N. J., Treasurer.

Negroes Plan a Great Ad ance

AFTER fifty years of education effort for the freedmen by the white urches of America, the Negro is now put to make a great effort on his own accou The four divisions of African Methodisn repre- senting 1,816,684 members, are coope ing in a great united effort to raise $2,000,(, or a little more than one dollar a men r, for education. They expect to raise this nount by January 1, 1918, the slogan for t cam- paign being "One Dollar per Meml " In the last four-year period these churc have raised a little less than fifty cents a mber or twelve and a half cents a year, so at the new goal means multiplying former g ng by six. In the last twenty years the frican churches affiliated with the Methodist pisco- pal Church (North) increased their nnual benevolence collections from $33 2 to $99,559, and their annual receipts fo urrent expenses from $755,304 to $1,413,272 This is the record of a membership of 35 52, or roughly one-sixth of all the African letho- dists. The African Methodist E scopal Church, the African Methodist Episc Zion Church, and the Colored Methodist E scopal Church in America, in cooperation h the Negro churches in the Methodist E scopal Church (North), have set themselves orthy goal. The churches have gained in sel spect as they have become self-supporting Now, if they can take over the support f the institutions of learning which for fif years have been maintained as a patriotic harity by the white Christians of America, y will have taken a new and a long step to d full citizenship. First slaves, then freedm , then wards, the Negro is now approaching e final goal of any race, full self-support a self- control.

Strong Drink the Foe of Missions

PROBABLY no more startling illustration of the evil effects of the liquor traffic on Christian missions in heathen lands has come to light than that which is related in the following letter from Mr. J. Newton, secretary of the Native Races and Liquor Traffic United Committee, Palace Chambers, London. The letter, which is addressed to Rev. Hervey Wood, the well-known American temperance worker, is given below:

"London, May 12, 1916.

"Here is an important and sad fact which I hope you will make use of at once in your religious press:

"A missionary from the Gold Coast, just returned, has been to see me this morning. He says that in August, 1915, a yam festival was held in a village near his station, where the people were supplied with large quantities of American rum. The result was a fearful orgy of drunkenness and a riot in which over thirty persons were killed. The government officials had to close down the liquor shops for a time, in order to restore peace and order to this African village. This is what Boston rum means when it reaches West Africa.

"J. NEWTON."

"This is about the worst case that has come to my hands," said Mr. Wood. "It ought to be made known to every Christian man and woman in America. I send it to the Christian Herald, so that its million readers may see it.

"Before the present war began, Holland was sending 3,000,000 gallons of gin yearly into the four British West African colonies. Boston was sending 2,000,000 gallons of rum, besides what was coming from Germany, France, Italy, the United Kingdom and other countries. Bishop Tugwell, of the Church of England Missionary Society, who has spent many years in Africa, reports that the women in his diocese (Northern Nigeria) have become so degraded that they pawn their babies to get gin. They call Holland gin 'Jesus water,' the Bishop said. 'They buy it from white people. They think all white people are Christians, and that gin is a part of Christianity. I know of an instance where six young men, natives, were staggering through a car, drunk, singing, 'Onward, Christian Soldiers.'

"Your readers may get some idea of the amount of gin being sent into Africa by the report of a missionary who called at the custom house of Secondee to get a case of Bibles that had been sent out to him. He was told to 'Call again in two days,' as there were 16,000 cases of gin and rum to be removed before his case of Bibles could be reached!

"The distillers and brewers of the United States are sending every year not less than 20,000,000 gallons of rum, whisky, and beer into lands where our missionaries are at work. Boston sends its rum, Baltimore its rye and bourbon whisky, and Peoria its carloads of liquor. They are sent to be shipped to India, China and Japan. At the same time Russia is also sending its vodka, Italy, Portugal and Spain their wines and liquors; in fact, all the so-called Christian nations are doing their share in this soul and body destroying traffic in missionary lands throughout the world. At a very low estimate, at least 100,000,000 gallons are sent over into heathen lands annually."

There was raised in the United States and Canada during 1915, according to the Annual Report of the Foreign Missions Council, $19,951,362.73. Yet not one dollar is reported for temperance work in mission fields. This is all the more extraordinary, in view of the fact that the missionaries unite in declaring rum the greatest foe of missions. There is a bill (H. R. 10924) now before Congress to prohibit the exportation of liquor to Africa. It is to be hoped that the bill will be passed and that ultimately a similar measure will be applied to every land where missionary work is in operation. Some such step must be taken if we are to save the missions.

Let the Sunshine In

The washbasket shuts out all the sunshine from Mrs. Hardway's life. She does her washing in the hard, old fashioned way—hard-rub and boil, boil and hard-rub all day long—and when night comes she is worn out, her regular work has piled up to be done the next day, and every day's work piles up all through the week. She is never through and always tired.

But, sunshine or rain, Mrs. Knowhow is cheerful, washday has no terrors for her. She is always through her week's washing before noon, and has all her regular work done besides. She uses Fels-Naptha Soap. It does the hard work for her. While the clothes soak for thirty minutes Fels-Naptha loosens every particle of dirt so that when she comes to wash a few light rubs and a thorough rinsing away of the dirt is all that's needed. No long boiling. No hard-rubbing with Fels-Naptha Soap.

Mrs. Knowhow uses Fels-Naptha Soap for all her household soap-and-water tasks. It cleans and purifies everything it touches, and does all housework as quickly and easily as it does her weekly washing.

What Fels-Naptha does for Mrs. Knowhow it will do for every woman. It really saves all hard work, and cuts the time in half as well. The reason?—Fels-Naptha is the perfect combination of soap with that wonderful cleanser—naptha. It hunts out dirt and makes it disappear, and all this without hard work on your part.

1916 Acousticon

R. Sayor Harnden, M. D., writes us—"The 1916 ACOUSTICON recently received is so perfect as to be almost a new invention. My use of various models for years has shown me that the relief and joy of those who talk with the deaf is perhaps the strongest evidence of the value of your marvelous instrument."

The unstinted praise of 250,000 satisfied customers and many letters like the above from eminent physicians lead us to urge you and every deaf person, entirely at our risk, without a penny of expense, to give the 1916 ACOUSTICON a thorough trial in your own home, absolutely and entirely

NO DEPOSIT FREE NO EXPENSE

All you need to do is to write saying that you are deaf and will try the ACOUSTICON. The trial will not cost you one cent, for we even pay delivery charges.

WARNING! There is no good reason why everyone should not make as liberal a trial offer as we do, so do not send money for any instrument for the deaf until you have tried it.

The ACOUSTICON has improvements and patented features which cannot be duplicated, so no matter what you have tried in the past, send for your free trial of the ACOUSTICON today and convince yourself—you alone to decide. Address

Merry Moments

When the Merry Moments column was started we announced that we could only return contributions when postage was enclosed. Some contributors, evidently forgetting this, have written inquiring as to the non-return of their contributions.

Double Proof.—A tramp knocked at a farmer's door and called for something to eat.

"Are you a Christian?" asked the good-hearted countryman.

"Can't you tell?" answered the man. "Look at the holes worn in the knees of my pants. What do they prove?"

The farmer's wife promptly brought out the food, and the tramp turned to go.

"Well! well!" asked the farmer. "What made those holes in the back of your pants?"

"Backsliding," replied the tramp as he hurried on.

Old Style.—Little Jennie, a primary pupil, was asked: "If your mother had five yards of cloth and used three in making your dress, how much would she have left?" After a moment's thought, she replied, "I think she'd have enough to make a petticoat."

As You Like It.—It was his first trip to the mountains, and his first dinner in a mountain home. When time came to serve dessert the old lady said, "We have three kinds of pie—plain, crossbarred, and covered, all apple; which will you take?"

According To His Folly.—The new minister was dining with an old lady. She had fried chicken for dinner, and he was very fond of chicken gizzard. Just for fun, he told her he ate them to make him handsome. She adjusted her glasses and looking him over, said: "Well, you ain't been eating them long, have you?"

Uncle Sam Is Buying 20,000 of 'Em.—The reading class struck the word "furlough." Teacher asked if any little girl or boy knew the meaning of the word.

One small hand was raised. "Furlough means a mule," said the child.

"Oh, no, it doesn't," said the teacher.

"Yes, ma'am," insisted the little girl. "I have the book at home that says so."

The next morning the child triumphantly showed a picture of an American soldier riding a mule, under which was the caption:

In The Place Of Danger.—A young mother hearing her two-year old crying loudly rushed to him and inquired anxiously, "What is the matter?" "The dog bit me," was the tearful response. "Where were you when the dog bit you?" "Boo hoo! I was—I was by—I was by the dog!"

Adding to the Ocean and the Language.—Marie was enjoying her first ocean voyage when she began to feel very, very sick. She did not know that this was the regular program for most ocean travelers. It was a surprise and she wailed, "O Mamma, I'm so afraid I shall have to unswallow."

One of Our Leading Families.—"This plant belongs to the begonia family," said the housewife who was showing her little conservatory.

"Ah," said the visiting neighbor, "you are taking care of it while they are away."—Boston Times.

Missed Her Chance.—A little girl about six years old was visiting friends. During the course of the conversation one of them remarked:

"I hear you have a new little sister."

"Yes," answered the little girl, "just two weeks old."

"Did you want it to be a little girl?"

"No, I wanted it to be a boy," she replied, "but it came while I was at school."—Western Christian Advocate.

Lucky It Wasn't Hercules.—A Scotchman in search of work was recently given employment as a laborer at a shipyard. His first job was to carry heavy planks. After he had been at it for several hours, he went to the foreman and said:

"Did I tell ye ma name when I started to work?"

"Yes," replied the foreman; "you said it was Thompson."

"Oh, then it's a' right," said the Scot as he looked toward the pile of planks he had yet to carry. "I was jist a-wunnerin' if ye tocht I said it was Samson."—Public Ledger.

Only A Lady In The Making.—Five-year-old Freddy often showed pugilistic tendencies. One day he had been using his fists on three-year-old sister Helen. His visiting Auntie said, "Freddie, don't you know that a gentleman never strikes a lady?"

Instantly Helen stopped crying and exclaimed, "They do, too."

"Why, Helen!" said Auntie. "When did you ever see a gentleman strike a lady?"

With an air of convincing proof, the little maid replied, "Why, my daddy spanks me."

NO woman in Palestine is too old or too young to work. A girl of six tends her small brothers or sisters, and the grandmother weaves or spins until the day she dies. As is common among Oriental women, those of Palestine age early and at twenty-five the ordinary woman of the laboring class is wrinkled and bent, unless as a water-bearer she preserves her erect carriage and queenly gait.

The old woman in the cover picture spins wool as she goes to her home or the fields where the men till the ground or beat the green olives from the trees. Her costume is composed of two pieces, unless she wears shoes, which is neither necessary nor customary. The full dress or tobe is gathered at the waist by a belt of coarse cloth, and is tied at the throat with a heavy string, so that a weather-beaten strip of neck can be seen below it. One piece of goods forms the front and another the back, and until Paris fashions affect the laborers, as they have already affected the drones in the Levant, a triangular piece of cloth, to give high-speed walking fulness to the skirt, is the only material added.

The veil is long and strong, and can be used to tie up fagots or to contain such measures of barley as Ruth had from Boaz in the fields near which this woman is spinning. Coarse and durable embroidery may decorate both tobe and veil, but the young bride wears embroidery for which rich tourists bargain in vain.

The thumb and forefinger of this old woman are hard and polished where they grasp the smooth-worn spindle on which the coarse yarn has been wound. With a quick twirl the spindle is set in motion, and the yarn is stretched out and made even by the hand with which she starts the spindle. When the bobbin ceases to spin, it is held against the dress to prevent it from reversing and unwinding the yarn which has been made. After three feet or so of yarn is spun to the desired twist, it is wound around the spindle and caught at the end as we catch thread on the end of the spool. M. O. W.

DOWN to breakfast early these summer mornings for a big bowl of Kellogg's Toasted Corn Flakes with milk and ripe red berries. Nothing quite approaches the delicious flavor of these crispy golden flakes in combination with the fresh fruits of the season.

There are eight wonderful toasting ovens at Kellogg's. One is the biggest in the world: as high as a 5-story house, it cost $10,000.

Questions and Answers

H. W., Golconda, Ill. I have read several statements lately in the public press that there are at this time as many as 2,000,000 men held as prisoners of war by the different belligerent nations of Europe in prisons and detention camps. Being myself an old soldier of our Civil War, and well acquainted with the misery and horrors of military prisons, such as Andersonville, Libby and Belle Isle, I sympathize with these unfortunate men. I therefore request the Christian Herald, if it can, to give some reliable information concerning the physical, mental, and moral status of these unfortunate prisoners. Did not the Christian Herald, or some church organization, lately send a deputation of ministers or evangelists to look after the spiritual needs of those prisoners of war? Has a system of exchange yet been devised, so that some of these men could be returned to their homes?

The aggregate of all prisoners held by the various nations at the present time is very large, but as all the governments do not report their prisoners with equal care, the total can only be estimated. Germany holds more prisoners up to date than any other two powers combined. There have been occasional exchanges, but no general system has yet been introduced. Many of the prison cámps are models of their kind; but in others, the system followed has given rise to the usual complaints of hardship. These are incidental to all wars, and were inevitable in the present gigantic conflict. The Christian Herald has cooperated in the organization of a movement for sending the Gospel to the great prison camps, which is now doing a good spiritual work among the prisoners. It affords a splendid opportunity for contributors to do practical Christian service among prisoners of many different nationalities.

Mrs. G. C. C. Over fifty years ago a Union Sunday School was organized in this locality. Later a Methodist Church was built and the school was invited to use the new church. Later the Methodists wished to make the school a part of their own denominational work, so a Methodist Sunday School was organized and the Union school resumed its sessions in the schoolhouse. Do you think that any one of these various steps was a mistake?

It may be that in this case no mistake has been made. It was certainly proper for the Methodist church to invite the Union school to use its building, and if later the Methodists desired a school of their own they had a right to organize one. And those who preferred the Union School were quite right in returning to their former plan. It is natural for those who are zealous adherents of one denomination to prefer to have a school which is directly affiliated with the denomination under the control of the Sunday School authorities of the denomination, and making the use of the denominational literature. So long as these various changes are made without ill feeling no one should be seriously blamed. It is only when jealousies and unkindnesses creep in that serious harm is done. Of course, the Union idea is preferable, and a community is fortunate whose Christian leaders can do their work in this spirit of real unity. On the other hand, however, there may be much said in favor of the denominational organization and oversight.

J. N. M., Wichita, Kan. "Good Friday" means "Holy Friday"—the title applied in the early days of the Christian Church to the day of the crucifixion. It was so called in acknowledgment of the great benefit derived from the Saviour's completed work.

Mrs. T. S. R., Monroe, N. Y. You might send Bibles, that are still usable, to the nearest mission or hospital, or to the warden or chaplain of the nearest prison.

F. F., Sioux City, Idaho. However much men may oppose the doctrine of original sin, the essential, outstanding fact remains that the heart of man, uncleansed and unregenerated, is "desperately wicked." It is needless to speculate upon what is so obvious. All the facts of individual history go to prove that the heart is prone to evil, and that sin is natural to the unenlightened. Our first parents were apparently only too willing to listen to the voice of the tempter, and it has been the same with their descendants ever since. "Ye must be born again," said the Saviour to Nicodemus. Nicodemus was a good man in the world's estimation, and had many excellent qualities; yet he needed the change of heart which alone could restore in him the moral image of God.

Reader, Montana. If you had greatly offended a dear friend and treated him shamefully, and he had forgiven you and now claimed your grateful affection, though you would rejoice in your heart over his goodness, yet you could not wholly shut out the memory of what you had done in the past. You would find yourself recalling the facts of your treachery and grieving that you had ever been guilty of such actions. It is natural and inevitable that we should profit by past experience and learn what to avoid. Besides, in the spiritual life, remorse is a discipline, and we must be content to bear it until God's grace gives us a happier state of mind. But the pardoned sinner, who is living close to Christ and has the full assurance of the divine forgiveness, should not dwell continually in the past. Christianity is a religion of joy, and the real Christian lives much in the sunshine and has little time for morbid thoughts. While no one may wholly escape regrets, they are made less and less poignant by the knowledge that our offenses have been covered, and will no more rise up in judgment against us. Thus the bitter recollection is even made sweet by the blessed assurance of God's magnanimity, and our sadness is turned into joy. We realize that these occasions of remembrance and regret are spiritually wholesome, as they serve to warn us against relapses, and make us seek a closer walk with God, that we may serve him acceptably. From such heart-searchings the soul comes forth strengthened and purified and filled with greater zeal than before. Whoso has been forgiven much, loves much.

Mrs. J. W. H., Wolfton, S. C. While healing by faith through prayer is not taught by the various denominations, all recognize that God's hand is not shortened that he cannot save, and that he is today the same all-merciful and omnipotent One as in the days when David (Ps. 103 : 3) wrote of him as the prayer-hearing God "who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases." The modern church has not laid much stress upon this feature of Christian experience, which was so marked in apostolic times. In a few evangelical bodies it is kept well in view, however. There is nothing in Scripture to imply that it was intended that the efficacy of the prayer of faith should cease with the passing of the apostles, but rather that the gift was designed to be a heritage of the church, dependent upon the measure of its faith. It is well to remember, however, that it was never meant that we should ignore the means God has placed within our reach, but we should rather use them and ask his blessing upon the act. Oil, used in anointing, was merely a symbol, and of itself had no saving or curative power.

CHILDHOOD

Frederick A. Reiter

Joyous are the days of childhood,
Happy, blithe, and gay;
How the air resounds with laughter,
Laughter all the day.
Gathering posies in the sunlight,
With no care opprest,
Singing till the darkening shadows
Beckon them to rest.

Childhood's days will soon be over,
Happy, blithe, and gay;
Laughter will not ever sparkle,
Laughter all the day.
Cares and sorrows come too quickly,
Bringing sighs and tears;
Let God's children have their childhood
In their childhood years.

C. C. S., Lakemont, Pa. In the Red-Letter Bible, all the prophecies in the Old Testament concerning Christ and his coming are indicated by a red star. You can procure it through the Christian Herald Book Department.

M. P., Salem, Mass., writes: "Apropos of the statement of A. G. in the Mail-Bag, let me remark that in November, 1885, in Topsfield, when exhuming bodies in the old cemetery for reinterment in the new, a grave that had been closed about thirty years was opened, and the casket was so heavy that extraordinary means had to be employed to raise it. The features of the woman were preserved, except the eyes d a part of the nose. Even the folds of her robe were distin and solid. The body of the husband buried at her side had re ned to dust. I wrote up the find for my paper and called it ase of petrifaction; but on further inquiry, I found that here had been many cases of bodies changing to a waxy sub nce resembling stone. Medical men I believe call it adip e." On the same subject, Mrs. O. E. H., Salem, Ore., tes: "Northeast of Lyons, New York state, there is the gr of my grandfather's sister. She married Abner Leem an heir bodies lay in the same brick-built grave and are both trified."

A. G. H., Eugene, Ore. The Bible, notwithstanding the attacks against it, has a stronger hold upon the hearts d a mightier influence on the lives of men today than i any previous age. Not only does the Christian Church rec nize this, but it is admitted by the greatest religious schola and even by many of the leaders in secular literature. The ible bears within itself the evidence that the men who w e it were inspired, or, as it is expressed in II Peter 1 : 21 ha "holy men of God [that is, men who were specially ca l to this work], spake as they were moved by the Spirit.' The theory of inspiration does not exclude but rather impl human agency. Our Bible as we have it today, is the la t a long series of translations; yet, through all the transl on the divine message which was put into the hearts of the ter has come down to us clear and unmistakable.

Reader, East Liverpool, Ohio. Does Paul in 1 Cor. 11 : -34, mean that we should not partake of meals in the c ch? No. Paul is speaking of the primitive Christian rch "love feast" or agape. Eating has always been ass ted with hospitality and good fellowship. And the cele tion of the Lord's supper doubtless took the form in the arly church of a meal partaken of by the local Christians in pirit of devotion and brotherly kindness. Paul's objection w hat some came not in this spirit, but in the spirit of gree ess. The real fault he found is expressed in verse 21. Each o was greedy to get his own supper. Some were crowde out. Others had too much. He called all this disgracef and blasphemous. He advised them to eat at home befor oming, and to attend the church supper in the spirit of un ishness and thoughtfulness, each willing to wait till othe had been served.

Mrs. M. J. H., Grafton, W. Va. What is the attitude c aiting on the Lord? (Ps. 27 : 14; Isa. 40 : 31). Is it t of prayer, praise and worship?

Prayer and worship are certainly implied in waiting the Lord. Praise may be thought of as coming later. T expression really signifies a deep, motionless silence. No tter word could be found than just this—to wait. Not to eak, nor plan, nor think, not to make any effort at consecra n or sacrifice, but just to wait for the voice of God. There far too little of this element in our prayers. When we p we are often so busy trying to talk to God that we do not gi him a chance to talk to us. Often his voice will change ou lans and desires, will reveal that a sacrifice we had thought t ake is unnecessary, or that a sacrifice we had thought terrib ard is delightfully easy. Most of all, we find thus his joy a his love and his peace. Then we go forward to new visio and new petitions and new faith, and out to work with n enthusiasm for old labors and new strength for new ors, counting all sacrifice easy so long as it pleases him an elps forward the task he wishes done.

C. W., Columbia, Mo., writes: "One of your reade asks the question how to spend Sunday. It is a hard ques n to answer, in these days when we seem to be drifting awa rom firm foundations. F. N., Dayton, O. When Christ taught his disciples t pray "Thy Kingdom come," what did he mean?

The passage refers to that moral and spiritual kingdom hich God sets up in the hearts and lives of those who forsake and come into subjection to his gracious rule, recognizing Son as the world's Redeemer. From the very beginnings of man history, this kingdom has existed in the hearts of tho who have "walked with God." and who, even though they l not the light of the Gospel to guide them, were led by fai and "waited for his salvation." When Jesus came the ki dom became a visible one. But its complete realization will y be reached when the whole earth is subject to the divine do ion. For this complete coming Christians ought still to pr for when the kingdom has fully come, then God's will s l be done on earth as fully as it now is in heaven.

China in Her Birth-Throes

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D.,
Founder of Christian Endeavor

Why try to put a title to this picture?

Weighing Chinese porkers, transported in China always in large rattan baskets, where they often spend two weeks

WHILE this article was being written in China, news was received of President Yuan Shi Kai's ne ected death; but the conditions in China are the sa now as before his taking off. China is still in chaos, how I believe the prospects of a steady and rapid etu to peace and prosperity, under the rule of the ew resident, are far greater than before Yuan's death. —F. E. C.

HOW can a man be born when he is old?" asked Nicodemus. How can a nation be born when she is old? we may well ask, especially of the most ancient nation in he o'ld, whose recorded history dates back to the im of Solomon.

Y our Lord proved to Nicodemus that a man ou be born when he is old, and old China is proving y ery day of her history that a nation, too, howeve venerable, can be reborn. There is no other ra ional explanation of the remarkable events that re king place today in "tho land of Sinim."

I ave just spent nearly seven weeks in China, ra ving 1,700 miles from the far northern province f nchuria to the southern province of Chekiang. For our weeks I was "marooned" in the city of Ha how, the capital of Chekiang, where the revo ti broke out two days after I reached there. The railroad travel with Shanghai was entirely suspen d, and the railway made impassa le the rebels. A severe illness de ain me still longer, and then, only y king a houseboat on the Grand an, at fifteen times the price of an rdi ry first-class railway ticket, oul I get to Shanghai; and thence I sea d to orderly Japan, where such ev tions are unknown.

S en weeks, some one will say, is a hor time to make up one's mind bot a country like China; but I av the background of three other isit to China during the last twenty-ive ears, and my own views have een supplemented and corrected by he aturer views of missionaries of wer , thirty and forty years' residen in China, and by diplomats of eco ized standing.

C na is doubtless in chaos, with one rov ce after another breaking away ron the central government at Pek g, and declaring itself free and nde ndent, while in all of them there s est, uneasiness, and distrust, nd e revolution is likely to break out t a moment, anywhere.

A yet, chaotic as is the state of he untry, it is not a hopeless chaos. o npare a big thing with a little, reinds me of the state of China's urr cy. There are many strong banks in China that are perfectly sound, and whose money is as good as gold; but when you cross an imaginary line between one province and another, your money will not be taken except at a discount, and not always then.

Shanghai is only 120 miles from Hangchow, for instance, and some of the strongest banks in the world are in the former city; but the railway station and telegraph office of Hangchow will scorn your Shanghai money, and you must get it exchanged at the brokers' for Hangchow bills, at two or three per cent. discount. It would seem that hard silver cash would be good anywhere, but Mexican dollars, the usual medium of exchange—except where the late Yuan Shi Kai impressed his visage on certain silver pieces—are worth different sums in different places.

Moreover, there is "big money" and "little money." A silver dollar is "big money," and in Peking you can get 136 large copper cents for it, though it is nominally worth only 100 cents; while a ten-cent piece the size of our dime is "little money," and you can get only eleven coppers for it. The difference between big and little money varies in every province. When you come to make purchases, you pay "little money" for some things, and "big money" for others; and it is enough to give one incipient nervous prostration to find out whether or not he has the right change.

In the remoter parts of China, the silver "shoes" are still used, and buyer and seller each carry a pair of scales, while the purchaser chips off with a chisel enough silver from his "shoe" to pay his bill, which the merchant again carefully weighs to the fraction of a grain, to see that he has enough. The "cash," worth now a tenth of a Chinese cent, or a twentieth of an American cent, has disappeared from the coast cities, where big copper cents have taken their place, but they are still used in the far interior, though even ten years ago they were of universal currency, and it was a common saying that one took a donkey to carry his cash to market and took his purchases home in his hand. Undoubtedly this financial muddle will in time be straightened out, and, even as it is, it is more a matter of inconvenience than of actual loss to those who "know the ropes."

IT seems to me that such also is the political muddle of China; not hopeless, not endless, but with elements of reconstruction and regeneration within itself. Of course, many selfish and unscrupulous men have doubtless seized the occasion of the revolution to advance their own interests; but the great mass of the educated people really desire a representative government and a genuine republic. Otherwise, how can one account for the almost universal uprising all over China, north and south and east and west?

I believe, too, that the common, uneducated people have far more understanding and sympathy with the revolution than they are usually given credit for. Many people say, "Oh, the peasants don't care; if they can get 'chow' enough they are content." I am not so sure of this. These people dislodged the Manchus and drove them out, bag and baggage, six years ago; they allowed their queues to be cut off, though with many protests and tears, and now it is a rare thing to see a pigtail in southern China. They have been learning much in the last sixteen years, since the Boxer uprising, and no longer despise and spit at foreigners, but respect and protect them.

The province of Chekiang, where I was "interned" for four weeks, gives a good illustration of the revolutionary spirit all over China. About four o'clock one April morning we were awakened by the firing of three or four guns. I lazily said to myself, as I turned over to go to sleep again, "The revolution is on," but I did not really believe that, with so little disturbance, anything serious could have happened. But in a few hours I found that I had guessed right; that the tutuh, or military governor, had been called out of bed by the leading revolutionists, and had been given his choice to join them or leave Hangchow. He chose the latter horn of the dilemma. Whereupon the independence of Chekiang was declared, the civil governor was chosen tutuh, and proclamations were posted on the walls declaring the province independent and that law and order must be preserved and looting would be punished.

To be sure, during the first hour or two the old governor's yamen or palace was looted by his former bodyguard, who I suppose thought it was their legitimate booty; but otherwise there was no disturbance, no bloodshed, only excitement and uncertainty for a day or two. After this, business went on as usual, except that the banks were naturally chary about loaning money.

THE missionaries, of whom there are a number in Hangchow, representing five different denominations, were particularly free from danger. A soldier was sent every night to guard the mission compound where I was staying and he beamed on us as though he were one of the family. Some high officials and many others sought refuge in missionary homes for themselves and their families and goods during the first days of the revolution, but there was no occasion for their good offices. The streets were more quiet and free from disturbance than the thoroughfares of New York or Chicago during the same days, and though thousands of soldiers were parading the streets, or guarding the railroad from an expected attack of Yuan's troops, there was no bloodshed and no rioting during the four weeks that we listened for the uproar of a possible lawless mob.

What was true of Chekiang has so far been true of most of the other provinces. There has been surprisingly little bloodshed or violence considering the serious nature of the uprising. I traveled through half a dozen provinces and met with no disturbance or detention.

Contrast this with a revolution in Mexico or in South America, and see the vast superiority in calmness and self-restraint of the mighty republic of China.

Consider the possibilities in our own count , i President Wilson (unthinkable proposition!) or t me President Roosevelt should pull the political ire to make himself emperor of America! How so w would be up in arms, how the tocsin would clan ho the telegraph wires would repeat the feat of Pa Revere in a thousandth part of the time!

What about Japan, do you say? Will she s p i and be the suzerain of China? I do not believe . have talked with many influential Japanese, fr th premier, Count Okuma, to men in private lif and editors of the most widely circulated newsp ers and all assure me that there are too many r sons both at home and abroad why Japan cannot a will not assume that rôle.

"Oh," I hear my Japanophobist friends in ina and elsewhere say, "he has been hoodwink by the courtesy and attentions of leading apanese."

I think I have made all allowances for suc one-sided impressions. I have no doubt Japan ould like to stand for a kind of Monroe Doctrine in ina and help straighten out some of the tangles an keep the rapacious European nations out. For my art I do not see why she should not. She can do it tter than any other nation, and with as little quest ning of her motives, though of course they will be imp ned just as our own nation's motives have been for hundred years all over the world.

I do not claim that Japan's motives would altruistic and altogether unselfish, but I do belie tha she is the only foreign influence, outside of the ritian missionaries, that can help China to a ble constitutional national life.

At any rate, we shall see what we shall see.

The Ghost at the German Table

By
CHARLOTTE TELLER

IT is quite true that I never had enough to eat while I was in Germany. Not that there was not enough on the table to satisfy any one's appetite. Not that there wasn't enough in the pantry, and in the shops. And the prices—with the exception of milk and butter—were no higher than here in New York.

But I never rose from the table with that sense of well-being that follows a care-free meal taken among friends. There was always a ghost at the table, one who looked on, hoping that every mouthful would be your last, prophesying that if you left your place at the table you would never get back to it again. Any one living in Germany during the war must give a place at the table to this ghost—to the English Starvation Plan.

In actual quantity, I think I ate more in Berlin than ever before in my life. As I was keeping house, I shared all the perplexities of the German housewife, from the problem of cooking one day a week without fat, to the making of mayonnaise without egg or oil. So I had little time to think of anything besides food.

To open the "War Cook-Book" and find in the introduction an appeal to patriotism—"England is trying to conquer the German people by hunger, but we shall fight to the end on this battlefield of the kitchen"; to open the woman's page of your paper and learn that "only if we change our habits of eating can we hold out to the time of victory"; to open your morning mail and find leaflets urging you to attend the new courses in thrifty cooking established in various parts of the city; to go to the Woman's Lyceum Club for a social evening, and have to hear an hour's talk on the benefit to soul and body of vegetarianism—all this leaves you little leisure to think of anything else, or even to follow the military campaigns on the war-map.

And the statistics! They were intended to allay anxiety. But to the man who never wants to think about his food except to criticize it if it is not all it should be, statistics are the last straw. We in the United States are much more used, because of our national habit of dyspepsia, to the discussion of albumen and carbohydrates and the rest. But for the German to have to study these things for the first time in order to learn on how little he can live and maintain his normal health when the day comes when there is little to be had—it is a grim lesson, and has its effect on the nerves.

BUT they are learning. Starvation has not yet set in. No one has yet been reduced to the necessity of eating his own words, unless it be the overzealous makers of "War Cook-Books." Within the first months of the war several cook-books appeared full of the most complicated advice about simplifying dishes. But before two months had passed, many of the ingredients called for by these recipes were no longer to be had. New cook-books appeared. Finally the women who had been responsible for them decided that it was not worth the effort. Since that time the women's magazines and the newspapers have supplemented the public lectures that are constantly being given on "war cooking."

All this is calculated to keep you reminded that the enemy is lying in wait, and that it is the desire of a government—if not of a people—to see the Germans acknowledge allegiance to King Hunger. So is the fact that many things looked to for aid at the outset have since disappeared.

There is oatmeal, for instance. None of it is to be had. What was on hand was commandeered for the horses, which needed it more than humans did. I was never particularly drawn to oatmeal as a breakfast cereal. But as soon as I found I could not get it, I felt that nothing could take its place.

I owe a great deal to the English Starvation Plan. I speak in all seriousness. I owe a new sense of what one needs and of what one wants, and of how little they have to do with each other. It gave me, too, the incentive to try unusual combinations, such as white beans cooked with prunes; cabbage and apples; and numberless old-fashioned dishes brought again into use to fill the place of modern and imported delicacies.

There was always plenty of humor in inviting your friends and giving them something which they had not yet thought of trying. And I never heard any serious complaints. Housewives were exasperated when they went marketing, but the petty troubles were swallowed up in the sense that this was war, although, in the way it affected the women and children, it resembled somewhat uncomfortably those wars of ancient times before war became a game played according to fixed rules. The situation has made great demands on the German good-humor; and not in vain. The Germans laugh genially over cartoons depicting a dairymaid imploring the family cow to give just a little more milk "for the sake of the Fatherland"; over the pathos of a vegetarian diet at the Zoo, made tragic, in the case of a family of tigers, by madame's fear that her lord will devour her if any one offers him another cabbage!

THE present situation, however, is not serious as far as actual danger of starvation goes, because the crops have been good. More acreage is under cultivation this year than ever before in the history of Germany—and that without the men to do the work! Moreover, every month since the middle of last year has seen an improvement in the organization and distribution of the food forces.

The appointment of a "Food Dictator" is to be looked on in that light. Statisticians had begun early keeping the printing presses busy with estimates on the proper apportionment of foods, and the proper prices to be paid for them. But the one element that statistics could not measure nor statute books control was the greed of the profit-seekers. One of the most interesting chapters in the psychology of war is the readiness with which the "upper classes" of all countries give up their lives in response to the appeal to patriotism, and the extreme unwillingness with which they give up their profits. It is said that the demand for peace in England will come from those same upper classes which gave their sons so freely as volunteers at the beginning of the war, but which will not tolerate a loss of their privileges nor a heavy tax on their incomes. And in Germany these very landowners, who feel genuine pride at the thought of having given four beloved sons to the Fatherland, are outraged at the thought of reducing the price (pork twenty pfennigs.

ONE of the difficulties in dealing with the G man food situation is the difference in rul and regulations between the different states of the e pire. There has, for instance, been no milk and itter problem for Bavaria and for some of the othe ates where pasture land is rich and sufficient for the ban population. But Prussia had supplied its wants efore the war only by importing from Denmark and H land to eke out its own supply, and is therefore now rced to make demands on Bavaria with which Bav ia is at times unwilling to comply. A "Dictator" ll be able to equalize the distribution and the price th ughout the empire. This means concentration of wer, and there has been some protest from those wl like our own States' Rights advocates, do not bel e in too much power in the hands of central auth ties. But it is the logical step if order is to be brou out of the chaos always present when profit is put ove the welfare of the people.

In the English and American newspapers hich arrive regularly in Berlin, I read of a great any "food riots"—a great many more than took lace. Those which do occur are much oftener due the unnecessary hardships involved in the meth s of distribution than to the lack of any particular ticle of food. If, for example, the policeman on duty fore a butter store knows that there is only enough atter there at half a pound apiece for fifty women, d he lets a hundred women stand two hours in tl rain when the doors are closed, the disappointed fi are likely to make it disagreeable for the gentlema For, had they known the situation, they could hav gone farther down the street and stood before a stor here there was more for sale. But, taking it all in al hese matters are better organized in Germany tha anywhere else in the world, and the desire for etter organization is nowhere else so prevalent.

No "dictator" is needed to deal with the r ilers who try to profit from the needs of the German ople during the war. Public opinion is quite adeq e to deal with them. One old woman asked for lf a pound of beef from a butcher in one of th pen markets near where we lived. He said there s no profit for him in selling so little, and she must th fore buy a pound. She said she could not afford t The bystanders, waiting their turn to be served, ur l th butcher to sell the half pound. He refused. here was a disturbance, and great excitement. So one went off for the police, who came and insist that the old woman be sold the amount of meat she ated. But that was not the end of it. His license to ll in the open market was taken from him.

The newspapers featured this story as a war g to all butchers. But the men at the top were do the same thing on a much larger and more da rous scale. And every one knew it. The "Dictat will really be appointed as the agent of public opi n to bring to justice those greater criminals wh still, because of their wealth and power, manage t lude control. On the day when public opinion nally learns how to reach the forces that bring on sta tion plans—and, finally, those which bring on wars then we shall have no more ghosts sitting at our tabl

The Family of the Republican Nominee

By ABBY GUNN BAKER

WITH the introduction of former Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Hughes to the country as a nominee for the Presidency, interest is felt in the kind of man he is at home with his family and what kind of a family he is. These are things about the Presidents and those who would be President of the United States which the public feels entitled to know. In the past few years as a people we have become fairly well acquainted with Mr. Woodrow Wilson and members of his interesting family. But the equally interesting Hughes household of six is by no means so well known.

It is quite a coincidence that both the men who are now making the race for the Presidency should be ministers' sons. As is well known, President Wilson's father, the Rev. Joseph R. Wilson, was a minister of the Presbyterian Church of the South, while Mr. Hughes, his opponent for the high office, is the son of a Baptist clergyman, the late Rev. David Charles Hughes of New York.

The day following the Republican nomination at Chicago was Sunday. As has been the custom of Mr. Hughes and his family, they started to go to their regular place of worship, Calvary Baptist Church. This is one of the most notable churches of the city. Although a down-town church it has the rather unusual record of a membership of more than two thousand, with a Sunday school of like number. The pastor of the church, Dr. Samuel H. Greene, is the dean among the ministers of all denominations in the city—having occupied his pulpit thirty-seven years. The church building is a large brick structure on the corner of Eighth and H Streets and is supplemented with a hundred thousand dollar Sunday school house, in which the industrial features of the church are carried on. The Sunday school maintains nine departments, including a Chinese Sunday school, Young Men's Christian Association, a branch for the Chinese women, and a kindergarten for the Chinese children. Work among the Italians is also supported, as well as a mission school on the east side of the city. A deaf-mute minister is employed who conducts regular services for the deaf-mute members, of whom there are forty or more. The church is remarkably missionary in spirit, supporting, and helping to support, a number of missionaries on the home and foreign fields, and maintaining a number of missionary organizations in the church. Its very active and popular women's missionary society is one of the largest in the Baptist denomination.

Mr. Hughes joined Calvary Church soon after coming to Washington. With his family he has attended the church services regularly, and they are identified with its activities, particularly Miss Helen, who not only is a teacher in the Sunday school and an earnest member of the Christian Endeavor Society, but also a splendid helper in other branches of the church work.

On the morning following Mr. Hughes's nomination the family started for Calvary Church as usual. Mrs. Hughes and their youngest daughter, little Miss Elizabeth, went in the electric runabout, which Mrs. Hughes herself drives. Mr. Hughes and Miss Catherine, the second daughter, both good pedestrians, walked to church, a distance of about a mile and a half. The latter had not gotten a block away from their home, however, before they were made to realize that they had come into sudden publicity. A respectful but increasing crowd followed them, and at almost every corner they confronted a camera leveled at them. Mrs. Hughes drove slowly, evidently planning to meet Mr. Hughes at the church door, but just as she was about to alight from her electric she found herself facing two lines of people under the surveillance of several policemen. She shrank back hastily, and then hurriedly went a little way up the street, where she waited until Mr. Hughes joined her.

BOTH Mr. and Mrs. Hughes were raised religiously. Mr. Hughes's father was a native of Wales—a Welsh Baptist pastor with the intense rigidity of principle which from the time of Cromwell has characterized the Nonconformist clergy of the British Isles and Europe. From his son's very infancy Rev. Mr. Hughes instilled in young Charles's mind a veneration and love for the truths of Christianity, and during his boyhood Charles made profession of his faith and united with his father's church. The gentle mother, who was an accomplished scholar, was of Scotch-English origin and more plastic in her temperament than the Welsh divine. She taught young Charles, who was their only child, until he was ready for the grammar grades, and it was she who laid the foundation of his splendid education, teaching him the power of self-control and inspiring in him a love for reading.

Mrs. Hughes's mother, Antoinette Smith, was a descendant from the Fox family of Connecticut, while her father, Walter Steuben Carter, was the eighth in descent from Elder William Brewster of the Mayflower. He was born in the old family home at Pleasant Valley, Conn. Soon after his marriage to Antoinette Smith he went to Milwaukee, Wis., where he established a large law practice, and where his daughter Antoinette, now Mrs. Hughes, was born, toward the close of the Civil War. Mrs. Carter died very soon after her daughter's birth.

Mr. Carter, Mrs. Hughes's father, in many ways was a remarkable man. He was a philanthropist and a patron of music and art, but primarily he was a devoted Christian gentleman. It is said that during the time he practiced law in New York City he gave more than one hundred young lawyers their start in his own office. Perhaps the most notable of the students to whom he thus lent a helping hand was the young man who subsequently became his law partner, who married his daughter Antoinette, who went on the Supreme Court bench, and who is now making the race on the Republican ticket for the Presidency, Mr. Charles Evans Hughes.

The groom's father performed the ceremony that united Antoinette Carter and Charles Evans Hughes in wedlock, December 5, 1888. It was a quiet home wedding at Mr. Carter's Brooklyn residence, and took place at high noon. The bride wore her going-away gown. After their marriage they went over to New York City and began housekeeping. Mr. Hughes's law practice increased gradually and two years later their only son, Charles Evans Hughes the second, was born. While Mr. Hughes filled the chair of law at Cornell their daughter, Miss Helen, was born in Ithaca. Miss Catherine, who was named for her paternal grandmother, first saw the light of day at Twilight Park in August of 1900, while her parents were there on their summer vacation. Little Miss Elizabeth, the baby of the household, was born in the governor's mansion at Albany, the first child of a chief executive of the state to have that honor. Neither Mr. nor Mrs. Hughes is of the type of those who blow a trumpet to announce their religious belief and practice, yet their home has always been a distinctively Christian home in the best sense of the term. In matters of religion Mr. Hughes believes as he does in matters of politics—that every-day life and every-day work go infinitely farther than profession and talk. In his own denomination he has served, and still serves, on important church and missionary conferences and boards. When living in New York City he was a member of the Fifth Avenue Baptist church, where he established and was the first teacher of the class which became so widely known as the John Rockefeller Bible Class. Mrs. Hughes was also reared in a religious environment and is in verity the Scriptural type of a woman who looketh well to the ways of her household; and she has always been so lovely a mother that her children could well rise up and call her blessed! While they were young she devoted herself to them to the exclusion of almost everything else, but recently she has identified herself with a number of philanthropic and patriotic societies. She is particularly interested in welfare effort for working girls.

They say in Washington that the home life of the Hughes family emanates from the library rather than from the parlor. From their earliest childhood books have been the constant companions of the Hughes children. Mr. Hughes reads aloud with rare skill, and even when busiest with his professional duties found time to read to his growing young people, and to transmit to them the love for good reading which his mother had instilled in him. Their children's studies, occupations and recreations were their first consideration always. The oldest child, and their only son, Charles Evans, Jr., made an enviable record as a student. He was honor man at Brown and led his class at Harvard. Soon after his graduation he was married to Miss Marjory Bruce Stuart, daughter of Mr. Harry C. Stuart of New York.

Miss Helen Hughes, the nominee's eldest daughter, is a rare girl, blessed with a happy disposition which enables her to see the happy side in everything. Aside from her church work she is a member of the College Women's Club of Washington, and has also thrown her influence into several social betterment efforts. She is one of the board of managers of the Young Women's Christian Association.

Miss Catherine Hughes is in her halcyon teens, athletic, and plays basket-ball and tennis with enthusiasm. She has matriculated for Wellesley College. Little Miss Elizabeth is the autocrat of the household.

A Week in the World's News

OUR INCOME GROWS. Income tax returns for the fiscal year which closed June 30 showed total collections from corporations and individuals of $124,867,430, of which the corporation tax yielded $56,909,941. Based upon the rate of taxation, these returns show that corporation profits in the year could not have been less than $5,690,994,178, while the personal incomes represented by the tax must have exceeded $6,795,748,850. With a new low record of failures for the first six months of 1916, 9,495 against 12,740 last year, we have reason to believe that the United States is measurably prosperous.

THE COURT OF PUBLICITY. Wife-beatings have increased in Kansas City, Mo. Fines and imprisonment having little effect, the police judge has ordered the revival of the pillory in order that the guilt of the condemned may be blazoned before the multitude. Maryland some time ago revived the whipping-post under similar provocation.

TO CHANGE PENSION BASIS. The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching has decided to abandon the plan under which it is now operating and to place its teachers' pensions on an insurance basis. The Teachers' Insurance Annuity Association is to be incorporated to do a pure insurance and annuity business, and teachers wishing to secure Carnegie pensions will be required to pay certain amounts as may be developed later. It has been found that the present practice of granting annuity to an old teacher after twenty-five or thirty years' service resulted in the lowering of salaries, which might otherwise have been raised, the teachers thus paying for their pensions involuntarily—as they will now do in part voluntarily.

LYNCHINGS DECREASE. Records kept by the Tuskegee Institute show that in the first six months of 1916 there were twenty-five lynchings in the United States as against thirty-four in the same period a year ago. Of the twenty-five victims, two were whites and twenty-three were negroes.

WHAT WILL THE POOR CONTRACTOR DO NOW? Public building contracts have always been held to be the legitimate prey of politicians and contractors who are willing to make money easily. The United States has its full quota of public-building scandals. Now comes Canada, but with less respect for the feelings of the public contractors, for in Winnipeg on June 29 Thomas Kelly, contractor for the erection of the parliament buildings in the province of Manitoba, was found guilty of defrauding the province of more than a million dollars.

FOR TRADE AFTER THE WAR. According to a special cable to the New York Times, the Hamburg American line is now building a vessel to be called the Bismarck, with a displacement of 56,000 tons, which will be the world's greatest steamer. In addition, this line is building two other vessels of large size. The North German Lloyd and the Hamburg South American lines are also reported to be constructing large vessels, two of 35,000 tons each for the New York traffic and several smaller ones for the South American trade. Altogether 55 vessels are under construction in German shipyards for merchant service.

IN HONOR OF ITS FOUNDER. The Brooklyn Central Young Men's Christian Association, which was started sixty years ago as the result of a gift by Frederick Marquand, is to perpetuate Mr. Marquand's name in a school for boys by which all the facilities of the building will be utilized to prepare boys for college, business, or along vocational and technical lines, combining with instruction an all-round training, to include athletics, public speaking, debating, glee club and orchestra work, and similar activities.

NEW CABINET IN CHINA. The state funeral of Ex-President Yuan Shi Kai was held in Peking June 28. In spite of the fact that all political elements are not yet in agreement, President Li Yuan Hung on June 30 announced the formation of a compromise cabinet, in which Tnan Chi Jui continues as premier, taking also the war portfolio. Japan has appointed Baron Hayashi, now ambassador to Italy, to succeed Eki Hioki as minister to China.

UNREST AMONG CANAL LABORERS. Something else may slip at Panama besides the earth. An announcement that the canal workers would be charged for the use of government quarters was considered at a mass meeting of metal trade workers in Panama on July 3, at which it was decided to ask an increase of ten per cent. of wages to offset the rental charges. A strike is a possibility.

TO PAY THE BILL. Those who have been wondering where Uncle Sam will get the money to pay for all the things he is buying for the army and the National Guard will be interested to know that the payment for the Panama Canal out of current revenues has left in the Treasury $240,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds, which can be sold at any time, and in addition to these the government has for sale about $200,000,000 in certificates of indebtedness.

THE GREAT BAY STATE. Massachusetts admits that it is the greatest state in the Union. In a recent compilation in the Boston Transcript, the claim was made that different cities in the state lead in the following industries: Brockton, men's shoes; Lynn, women's; Haverhill, slippers; Beverly, shoe machinery; Peabody, tanning sheepskins; Malden and Melrose, rubber boots and shoes; Holyoke, paper-making; Waltham, watch-making; Attleboro, jewelry and silverware; Leominster, combs and hairpins; Gloucester, fisheries; Lawrence, worsted goods; Plymouth and Ludlow, cordage. And in all of this the humble bean isn't mentioned.

MILLIONS FOR ROADS. Texas counties have issued or are about to issue a total of $10,000,000 in bonds for the construction of modern highways in the state.

COTTON ACREAGE INCREASE. The cotton acreage has increased this year from 32,107,000 acres to 35,994,000 acres and the Department of Agriculture estimates that the 1916 crop will be about 14,266,000 five-hundred-pound bales. The record crop was 16,134,930 bales in 1914.

LEFT HIND FEET IN THE TRENCHES. It is reported that on May 20 the steamship Cumberland passed through the Panama Canal with a cargo of 500 tons of rabbits dressed and fi en, consigned from Wellington to Live pol.

IMPORTANT NEWSPAPER CHANG It was announced on July 1 that Mr. Frank A. Munsey had purchase the New York Sun (morning and ev ing editions) and would combine w it the New York Press, already own by him. The new Sun is now appe ing daily, with the modern and gr ous announcement: "It shines for ll." May its skies be never overcast!

LIKE A WEATHER REPORT. is proposed at Calgary, Alberta, to ablish municipal golf links to absor the time that was formerly spent in sa ons. Alberta went dry at midnight Ju 30. Altoona, Wis., has opened a mur pal saloon to replace four saloons ced out of business. The profits fro the municipal saloon are to be us to build a city waterworks plant.

DUMA VOTES FOR COMPARATIVE PR BITION. In last k's Christian Herald we noted the reponderance of prohibition sentim in the Russian Duma. On June 3 the Duma passed a prohibition bill ich prohibits the sale of all drink cont ing more than one and one-half per ce of alcohol. The bill must still be p sed by the Council of the Empire and approved by the Czar.

DRIFTING TOWARD PEACE. W her the massing of American troops ar the continued arrival of detachments the Guard along the border brought ew light to General Carranza, or w her the efforts of various diplomats of in-American countries in the intere of peace were mainly responsible, is certain that the atmosphere o the Mexican controversy is decidedly c red and that the temperature of th discussion is very much below w it was a week ago. In reply to Sec ary Lansing's notes of June 20 an 25, General Carranza has sent one ery conciliatory in tone and it is bel ed that it will serve as a basis f an amicable adjustment. General Car nza says:

> This government is disposed now, as has always been, to seek an immediate solut of the two points which constitute th rue causes of conflict between the two cou ies. The American Government believes, onably, that the insecurity of its fronti s a source of difficulty; and the Mexican G rnment, on its part, believes that the s of American troops in Mexican territory, ide

GHTING FOR HER CHILDREN. New Yo City is fighting a new epidemic of fantile paralysis. Up to July 6, 63 cases had been reported, 134 of wh h resulted fatally. The majority of th cases have been in poorer sections wh e rules of health and hygiene and re ations regarding cleanliness of bu ings and disposal of garbage have be disregarded. But the disease has no een confined in those sections. The St Board of Health and boards of he h of surrounding towns united with th Board of Health of New York in an or ized effort to prevent the further sp d of the disease. On July 5, Ne York City appropriated $80,000 to fig the epidemic. Many physicians ga up their vacations, and all the me cal and hospital equipment of the cit was concentrated in an effort to sta the progress of the epidemic. All ch ren under sixteen years of age were ba d from moving picture theaters; an Vacation Schools, Fresh Air Fund ex rsions and Sunday schools were pe itted to continue only under strict qu antine regulations. The epidemic ca d an exodus of children from New Yo, more than 60,000 having left the cit in the week after July 1. Cases ha appeared outside of Greater New Yo on Long Island, in Newark, N. J., an in Binghamton, N. Y. Authorities ag that the disease may be carried by th parties as well as transmitted di tly from one person to another. Th house fly is blamed for much of th spread of the disease, and experts be ve that dust harbors the germs. Th ughout New York there is, therefo an energetic campaign, under the au ority of the Health Department, ag st dirt, darkness and flies. Dr. C les F. Boldau of the Health Depa ment advised parents to take their ch ren out of town. He advised that ev y child have his own handkerchief, an that no common use be made of an article that could carry a germ. The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indèpendance Belge

ON Saturday, July 1, at about one in the afternoon, after an hour and a half of concentrated artillery bombardment of the German trenches on the line in Picardy running south from Hebuterne to Foucaucourt, the Allies, under the supreme command of General Foch, began a general assault of said German trenches.

General Foch, the commander of this movement, is, in the opinion of most of those competent to judge, the greatest military leader so far produced by the war among the Allies, and as a strategist is considered to be almost a genius. It has been this general's fate to be in command heretofore in the most difficult situations—the defense of Ypres, the French offensive in Champagne last year, and so forth—and while in some cases, owing to their numerical inferiority, or other good military reasons, the troops under him have failed to accomplish the objects of his strategy, yet in no case has General Foch been obliged to submit to more than a check in his projected movements, and never to a well-defined defeat.

The scene of the present offensive—if it really be an offensive and not, as some good judges for sound reasons think, a feint in force for the purpose of laying the foundations for a real offensive at the more vital portion of the battle line, the German right wing confronting the Allies' left from Arras to the sea—is on what is called the Picardy front. The line of this front prior to last Saturday began at Hebuterne and thence ran slightly southeast through Hamel to Becondel, two miles due east of Albert, thence accentuating its southeasterly direction through Suzanne and Cappy, between which two places it crossed the river Somme, and ran from the last-named place in the same general direction to Roye.

This whole line is about twenty-seven miles in length. Both British and French troops took part in the movement, the British troops occupying the northern portion of the front (from Hebuterne south to a point about three miles north of Suzanne) a distance of fifteen miles; the French the southern twelve miles. The assault was made simultaneously by the French and British troops, but for the sake of clearness it is perhaps best to narrate the story of the achievements of these troops separately.

On their portion of the line the British attacked the whole length with great violence, and in their first rush succeeded in carrying completely the German first line trenches and capturing some 4,000 prisoners, besides considerable artillery; and so successful was this rush that by Sunday night they had established themselves on a line directly east of the old line, beginning at Gommecourt, one mile northeast from Hebuterne, and running about the same distance east of the old line, southeasterly through Tous Vents Farms and Serre to Beaucourt, northeast of Hamel, and on the Ancre River, a total north-and-south distance of about four and a half miles.

South of the Ancre, however, the line of the new positions curves westwardly, running from Beaucourt to Thiepval, which place is less than half a mile to the east of the old line, whence the new line runs in a curve steadily growing more accentuated to the east through Contalmaison to Montauban, the point where the British made their greatest gain to the east, four miles. After leaving Montauban, the new line turns sharply and runs almost directly to the west for a trifle over two miles until it reaches the village of Mametz, whence it turns directly to the south again and so continues for a mile and a half, when it begins to curve to the east again and continues until it reaches the point where the right wing of the British takes contact with the left wing of the French at a point on the road leading from Suzanne to Mancourt, just under a mile to the south of the last-named place, and about two miles from the original battle line.

All the places between the original battle line and this new line were not taken in the first rush; some, like La Boisselle, Beaucourt and Ovilers, being surrounded only, and after the British attained the new line they turned to the work of completely conquering the intervening territory, thus consolidating and securing their new lines. This operation occupied Monday and Tuesday, though one place, La Boisselle, was not completely in British hands until Wednesday afternoon, its garrison putting up an unusually stiff defense, preferring to die rather than surrender.

In the meantime, the Germans began heavy counter-attacks from the east, particularly on the British newly acquired positions at Thiepval, Montauban and Mametz, and the repelling of these counter-attacks occupied the British so thoroughly the remainder of the period under consideration that no further advances of moment were made by them, and July 6 found them occupying substantially the line above outlined. In this latter fighting, however, the British took 2,000 additional prisoners, but the Germans in their counter-attacks also captured about a thousand British. In the middle of the week the weather changed, and the later fighting was in a torrential downpour which interfered with the troop movements.

The French advance was split by the river Somme into two divisions, one covering the front north of that stream from the end of the British line south to the river, a frontal distance of about five miles, and the other a distance to the south from the Somme of about seven miles. The French, north of the river, were very successful at first, and continued their success, though not progressing as rapidly to the eastward, in the subsequent days. Their first rush carried them through Curlu, and later, after a very hard fight in the stone quarries north of Curlu, they captured the German trenches as far north as the Maricourt-Clery road; still later improving their position by taking the village of Hem to the east, and at the same time moving sufficiently to the westward to take contact with the end of the British right wing, which had not moved forward as rapidly and was, therefore, still to the west, that is, to the rear of them. After Hem was captured, Clery soon followed, but the German defensive stiffened, and though the French have moved eastward their progress was slow and difficult. North of the Somme the French have reached a point about two and a half miles from Peronne, an important railroad center, which place is their primary objective.

South of the river the French did equally well; nowhere at first were the Germans able to resist their strong and impetuous advance. First, Frise, Dompierre and Bocolincourt changed hands; then Buscourt, then Deuillieres on the southern bank of the Somme was taken, while farther south Herbecourt and Flaucourt changed masters, these two after very hard fighting. Still farther south, Assevilliers, and then Barlieux, directly east, and Belloy-au-Santerre fell into their power. At Belloy, the Germans made a fierce counter-attack and recaptured the village, but held it only for a few hours, when they were again driven out and the French movement to the east resumed. Still farther south the hardest fighting during the French advance took place around Estrees, where for three days the rival forces wrestled for the possession of the hamlet in hand-to-hand combats. South of the Somme the French advanced positions are as near to Peronne as they are in the north, and a desperate struggle for the possession of this town seems certain in the next day or two.

The French have altogether captured in their advance about eleven thousand prisoners and taken a very considerable quantity of artillery. The results of this Anglo-French movement cannot yet be forecasted, the movement not having yet sufficiently developed.

THE activity on the other portions of the western battle line did not prevent very hard fighting on the northern front of Verdun during the week. This fighting, as far as the infantry part of it is concerned, centered almost altogether around Fort Thiaumont. This fort, during the whole of the past week, has changed hands almost daily. Four times the French drove the Germans out, and five times the Germans, returning to the charge, ejected the French. At the moment, this mass of tangled ruins is in German possession; but it can be imagined in such bitter fighting how heavy the losses have been on both sides.

On Froid Terre ridge adjacent to this fort there has also been hard fighting, really part and parcel of that at the fort itself. Who holds at the moment the Damloup battery farther east cannot be said, as both sides claim it. On the rest of the Verdun fronts there have been only very minor infantry actions without particular results. The artillery activity, however, has been great on both the north and west fronts.

THE Austro-Italian campaign presents little of interest in the events of the past week. The Austrians have entrenched themselves solidly on the southern (Italian) slopes of the mountains forming the frontier, and there are receiving and generally repelling the successive assaults which the Italians are delivering, and at some points the Italians are making some progress.

On the Isonzo River front east of Monfalcone an Italian attack succeeded in capturing Austrian trenches extending over about a mile of front, taking prisoner some six or seven hundred Austrians, and capturing several cannon.

The northern border of Greece shows no particular change, both sides seeming willing to preserve the status quo indefinitely.

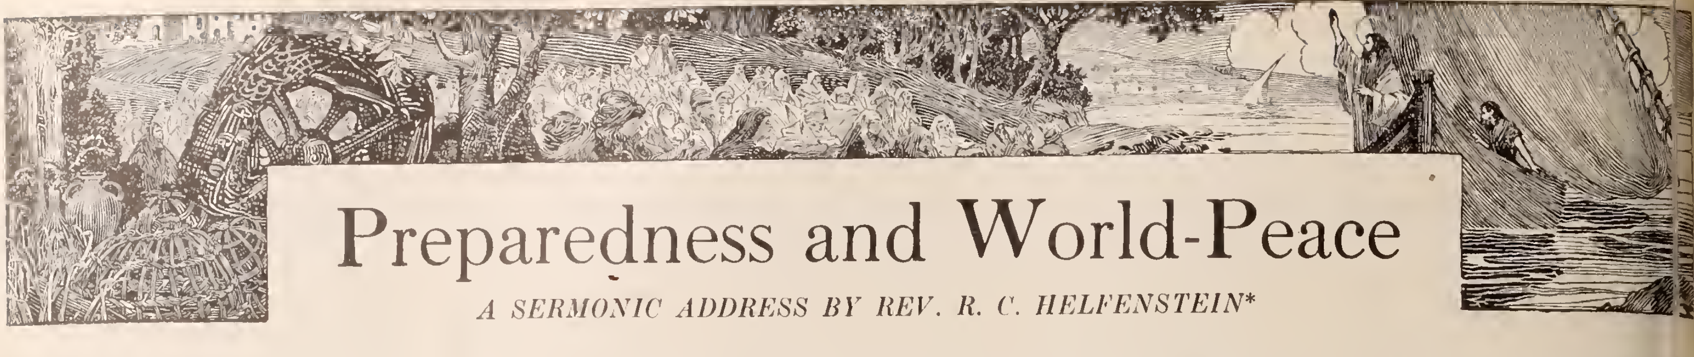
Submarine Reaches Baltimore

LEAVING Bremerhaven, Germany, on June 23, the new German merchant submarine Deutschland entered the Virginia Capes at 1.45 A.M. July 9. The Deutschland crossed the North Sea, skirted the British Isles, and laid a direct course across the Atlantic, avoiding the regular steamer lanes. Several merchant steamers and one British cruiser were sighted; but the Deutschland avoided detection in each case by submerging. The submarine has a surface speed of thirteen to fourteen knots, greater than the average regular merchantman, and can submerge in two minutes, when running at full speed. She carried a cargo of about 1,000 tons, of which 100 tons was dyestuffs, and brought mail for the German Embassy. It was reported that she brought a personal letter from the Kaiser to President Wilson. The Deutschland is operated by the Ocean Navigation Company, the North German Lloyd being American agents, and is probably the pioneer of a regular submarine merchant service which will be maintained between American and German ports until peace is declared. Simon Lake, the American inventor of the even-keel submarine, declares that commercial submarine operation would be feasible and profitable even in times of peace. English opinion frankly questioned the possibility of a commercial submarine reaching this country, and the British and French naval vessels patrolling waters off American ports maintained a close watch, but the submarine has arrived, and, by all the evidence at hand, will without doubt depart again. The Deutschland carried no guns, for offense nor defense, and carried no torpedoes. Under the ruling of the State Department in the case of Allied vessels, this condition would permit her entry into our ports as a peaceful merchantman, if she carries proper papers, manifests and clearances. The Captain of the vessel, Paul Koenig, has denied that he brought any communication for President Wilson. The Deutschland covered 3,800 miles on her epoch making trip.



Preparedness and World-Peace

*A SERMONIC ADDRESS BY REV. R. C. HELFENSTEIN

TEXT James 4:1. "Whence come wars and whence come fightings among you?"

SIXTEEN months ago we had heard and read so much about the horrors of modern warfare, as it has been waging across the ocean, that as a unit our nation was disgusted with the nations gone mad in war. Our Chief Executive sent out nation-wide appeals for prayer in behalf of world-peace. Scarcely a voice was raised in behalf of "preparedness," except an occasional muttering by the manufacturers of munitions of war, and by capitalists whose coffers would be filled by an extensive "preparedness" program. Then the jingo editors gave their sensational echoings of the same.

But the mood of the people has changed. Public opinion is being swept off its feet by this hurricane of "preparedness" agitation. Army and navy officers aspiring for the promotion which war alone can give them; munition manufacturers, greedy for the profit from the large sales which only war can make possible; self-seeking politicians hunting a winning plank for their party platform, have been running up and down the country calling "To arms! To arms! our nation must prepare for war!"

MANY have been intoxicated with the childish delusion that "preparedness" enhances a nation's glory. But thank God, this untimely agitation has not swept all our people off their feet. Many of the really big minds of our nation stand foursquare in protest against this hysteria for extensive "preparedness." David Starr Jordan of Leland Stanford University, President Faunce of Brown, Doctors Fitch and Jefferson of New York City, Professor Rauschenbusch of Rochester, among the leading educators of our nation, and thousands of other men of prominence in the educational world recognize the fallacy of the "preparedness" craze. Occasionally a university president or professor may be casting his influence with the "preparedness" movement for political reasons, or it may be from the pressure of personal convictions; but neither motive argues the validity of their position. If public opinion would but seek the calm waters of meditation, reflection and unbiased investigation long enough to analyze the nature of this "preparedness" mania, it would find that the whole thing is a piece of political quackery. Politicians are anxious to know whether or not the people of the United States favor an extensive "preparedness" for war. These public demonstrations, "preparedness" parades and all the rest are but the clever hand of politicians taking the pulse of public opinion on the question of "preparedness," that they may know whether or not it will be a winning plank for their party platform. God forbid that such politicians shall have their way. Our nation, pray God, must not be caught in the whirlpool of fatality in which Europe has fallen, namely—extensive "preparedness." Any political party which would jeopardize our nation's peace simply to insure itself leadership is un-American. This is a time when men should rise above party prejudices and stand together for America.

Partisanship is not patriotism—it is ofttimes a foe to true patriotism. A time like this calls for men to put the nation's good above the party's ambitions, to stand for the nation's welfare above everything else. Our nation's greatest danger lies not at the seat of any foreign power, but right here in our midst, right here in America. We need "preparedness" against the foes from within more than we need it against Japan, Germany or any other foreign power. The war devils are not all abroad. Many of them are within our own borders. We need to be fortified against the subtle attacks of the munition manufacturers, munition stockholders, and combines, which for selfish gain would crucify our national security and peace. We need to be prepared to meet the attacks of the political aspirants who put their petty schemes for party strength above the common good and the national welfare. We need "preparedness" against those restless spirits among us who are ill at ease unless in the throes of excitement.

WHAT does this "preparedness" agitation as expressed by the numerous parades mean? It is not purely an expression of the people's patriotism. Those who have financial interests in war and preparation for war are at the bottom of the movement, and the polticians follow a close second. Then the misguided public, out of pure motives, seeking to express their patriotic fervor, fall in line, and the parades move on. But they who say it shows a lack of patriotism on the part of those who refuse to enter or promote these parade demonstrations are wrong. It is a shallow type of patriotism that has to manifest itself in the hurrah line of a parade. It is an unstable sort of patriotism that is brought to life or self-expression by the sight of glittering uniforms and the sound of fife and drum. Such is but superficial emotionalism. Out of sincere patriotism many men refuse to take part in these "preparedness" parades, for they do not approve of such measures. A more patriotic man could not be found than President Arthur Twining Hadley of Yale University, but he set his foot down on the proposition of the Yale students taking part in the absolutely meaningless "preparedness" parade of nearly 200,000 men in New York City a few weeks ago.

MANY people who are talking "preparedness" do not have any conception as to what limit such "preparedness" should go. They really do not know what they want "preparedness" for. They ridicule the peace propagandists as wanting "peace at any price." But the foremost peace advocates are no more "peace at any price" men than are the "preparedness" agitators. There is no such thing as a peace-at-any-price movement in the United States. What the peace advocates maintain and what every follower of the Prince of Peace should adhere to is the principle of promoting peace rather than war. They believe that ways and means can be devised among the nations whereby international disputes can be settled by arbitration councils, world courts, conciliation congresses, and so forth. The peace advocates believe in "preparedness" to preserve life rather than to destroy it. They believe in a "preparedness" for peace rather than a "preparedness" for war. They believe with General Sherman that "the only legitimate purpose of war is the effecting of a more perfect peace." They believe that war stands condemned before the bar of modern opinion. They believe that our nation has already been maintaining a reasonable "preparedness," and that this wild clamor for more extensive "preparedness" is absolutely unwarranted. If we have been spending an average of three hundred million dollars a year since 1886 for military purposes, we ought to have something to show for it. We need a "preparedness" for efficiency more than we do for more armament. We need to investigate how this vast sum of money has been and is being spent, instead of making larger appropriations to be squandered. The "preparedness" leaders are asking Congress for an appropriation of one billion dollars for increased armament, quite oblivious of the fact that it is war and preparation for war that ties the heavy burdens of taxation about the people's necks—burdens grievous to be borne.

It is just such "preparedness" agitation as has been sweeping public opinion off its feet that may push our nation into the hell of war. The psychology of war is a treacherous thing. Let Europe speak to America tonight—let the stricken millions in Albania, Armenia, Poland and Belgium, innocent countries that did not want war, but its ravages were thrust upon them—let them speak to America tonight. Let Germany, France, England, Russia, Italy, and the other nations that of their own free will and accord entered the war, let them speak to America tonight, and they would cry, "America, don't prepare yourself for such a hell as we are in. Keep your peace! Keep your peace!" What would Europe not give for our peace tonight? The war has been waging now for twenty-two months. The losses to date, we are told, amount to $35,000,000,000 in money and the lives of 2,950,000 of the choice men of Europe; and yet those nations are farther from agreement today than they have been at any time since war was declared.

AMERICANS have lost their power of imagination, else they would not fall in with the "preparedness" propaganda. If we make it plain to the world that we are going to prepare in an extensive way for war, we will get war. And if we do, it will be the fault of our greedy capitalists, who have been getting rich off Europe's suicide. Canada at first sent 75,000 of her sons to help her mother country—later she sent 75,000 more, and again 75,000 more, and 75,000 more are getting in readiness to go. Do we have 200,000 American sons to offer up on the altar of war? Not unless America's honor is at stake. But not a single American son do we have to offer on the altar of war, simply to protect the commercial interests of greedy capitalists. The people who clamor the loudest for preparedness in the name of patriotism are not those who would be the first to enlist if such "preparedness" should precipitate us into war. Others w do the fighting. If it were understood that the co ge presidents and professors, the jingo editors and ty politicians who cry out for greater "prepared s" would be put in the first line of battle, many of em would change their attitude. It is an easy thi to talk about the power of patriotism in inspiring en to favor extensive "preparedness," when one, be use of age or profession, knows he will not be subject t he dangers his program imposes.

THE annual cost of militarism in the United S tes is estimated at about five hundred million do rs. Certainly we have a reasonable "preparedness already. Why are the "preparedness" leagues c ng for more? Some say to protect ourselves from a invasion by Japan, by Germany, or by England. ut they are reckoning without their host. Europe i ck of war. Her experience is conclusive refutation he fallacy of the argument that "preparation for wa revents war." The nations of Europe were never ter prepared for war than in August, 1914; and in ad of that "preparedness" insuring her peace, it is co ng her life. The New York Independent quotes the timate of Professor Richet of the University of is, which puts the daily cost of the present war as 9,750,000. Add to this the loss of the labor power he 20,000,000 soldiers at the low figure of $3 each a y, and the cost of Europe's war is seen to be n ly $110,000,000 every day. Enough money is spent ch day in the war to buy a $2,000 home for each of 5 00 families. Such a waste of money in human slau ter is sin, and high heaven holds the nations as g lty of murder and of robbery, for society is being ro ed of that amount of money every day.

This whole matter of war is wrong. Americ an best fill her mission in the world by seeking to ad the warring nations back again into the paths of p ce. Statistics show that for every dollar England sp nds for educating her youth, she spends $4.25 for mi arism. Germany spends $2.57 for militarism to ery dollar for education, France, $4.80 and Russi 12 for militarism to every dollar spent for educat nal purposes; whereas the United States spends $1. for militarism to every dollar for education. En gh money is spent every year in target practice b our navy and army in learning how to kill their fellow en, to educate every worthy young man and woman i he United States who aspires to an education, b is deprived of the privilege on account of financial c ditions. The cost of a dreadnought equals more tha he cost of all the buildings belonging to the Univers of Illinois. The cost of firing a single broadside fr a dreadnought is $20,000. Three such broadsides, ed in five minutes of experimenting, would equal $1 00 more than the city of Urbana, Ohio, has allowe for educational purposes in all its public schools for ext year. The Christian world has been responding t he need of the poverty-stricken of Armenia, Po nd, Albania, and Belgium, in giving a few million d ars a year to buy them bread; but two of the natio at war sink enough money in a single battle to pr de for the helpless in Europe for ten years' time, b les offering up the lives of more than 8,000 men—ar for what? No one knows. Nations are fighting, rtgaging their future, piling up war debts that will ish the spirit of posterity, if there will be any post ty. The earth is being turned into a veritable hell y der in Europe, and what for? Is it possible that ou nation wants to prepare for such a hell as this? od forbid!

I BELIEVE our nation had a thousand times ter make an appropriation for a billion dollars t relieve the suffering millions in Europe today, th to spend a billion dollars in preparation for hu an destruction. I believe America had a thousand es better spend a billion dollars in seeking to pro te peace, than to spend it in seeking to prepare for ar. Suppose we spend a billion dollars in building b leships that are superior to any owned by Engla or Germany. Those countries would not rest until ey had built ships just a little superior to ours, nd equipped them with guns that would carry just a tle farther than ours, and so the game would con ue indefinitely. As long as preparedness for war in vogue, no nation is going to rest until it outdoe he others in efficiency of armament, and hence ther ill be no rest. Wars and rumors of wars cannot cea so long as nations follow the damnable policy of prep ng for war to preserve peace.

Getting Out the Wings

SUNDAY, July 23. Isa. 40:31. "They shall mount up with wings." "My religious organs have been ailing for a while past. I have lain a sheer hulk in consequence. But I got out m wings, and have taken a change of air!" That is ıst it, we forget or neglect our wings. We travel al g our roads as mere pedestrians, and we are sorely ovcome, for the hostility of our circumstances w ries us to the dust. Or we are engaged upon soe exacting ministry which imprisons us in our paicular place. Or maybe we are shut up in a chambe of sickness, either as the patient or in service upn the patient. In a hundred different ways we ca be cribbed, cabined, and confined, and our religous organs are in danger of becoming sickly, and of lo ıg their brightness both in mood and discernment.

nd all the time those wings are waiting! And if w vould, we could soar into larger regions in an ampl air. In one of his most powerful poems Browning acresses an angel as "thou bird of God!" And sly we are entitled to use the phrase of the soul. Pıaps we have held too much the conception of th pilgrims, and even in our thinking we may have kt too close to the road. We are not only pilgrims othe night; quite as truly we are the birds of God, eowed with power to mount up with wings as eaes, to respond to the upward calling, and to bıthe the lofty air of the heavenlies in Christ Jesus. B we forget our wings!

ven the finest pilgrims are those who remember th they are also birds. The crusaders, who wage th noblest conflicts along the road, are just those who gout their wings and soar for a change of air. The mı who takes occasional flights to the New Jerusalem is more efficient laborer in the old Jerusalem.

nd how do we put on the wings? "They that wt upon the Lord . . . shall mount up with wings!" h this realm communion is ascension. When we tı our hearts unto the Lord the power of wing is os, and we can rise from our little prisons, or from o tiresome road, into the high heaven of spiritual re and vision. In the Christian life rising is resting. Wen we have been on the wing we shall be able to wk and not faint. And those wings are waiting fous! But how we do forget them! J. H. J.

The Riches of Jesus' Shepherd-love

MONDAY, July 24. Zech. 11:1-14. "They weighed for my hire thirty pieces of silver." Five h dred years before Judas sold the true Shepherd for tlty pieces of silver—the price of a slave—that scene h been enacted in the streets of Jerusalem, freshly rin from its ruins. Here is prophecy in action. T Holy Spirit often led the prophets to embody in stking deeds their conceptions of the future. When Zhariah acted thus the land was full of violence, a he felt called to assume a shepherd care for the pple. Two staves were in his hand: the one a club toeat back the beasts of prey, the other a crook to eicate any sheep that might be entangled in pit or tlket. The one was called Beauty or Grace; the oer Bands or Union. These were the rod and staff owhich David sang in earlier days.

inally, the prophet challenged the people to appise his services, and to estimate them according tctheir money value. He may have done this in tl temple, as he faced those who held priestly office, tlugh they lacked the priestly heart. Contemptuoly, they weighed out to him thirty pieces of silver, amuch as to say that his services were as worthless a hose of some poor menial employed in the lowest lbr. As we read the story, we see our Lord, who cae from the Father's bosom to gather the flock oIsrael. With his staff of Grace and his crook of Le he would have saved them, but they would have ne of him, and became the flock of slaughter. Let utake heed that we fall not under that same condination by despising the riches of his shepherdle, extended to our fickle and wayward hearts.

The Sovereignty of Manhood

UESDAY, July 25. John 19:5. "Behold the Man!" The title that Pilate gave to Jesus on h way to the cross has been made by history a sereign definition of the Son of God. If proof were nessary of the belief of the Almighty, it would be enough to remember that He gave to Christ the title "the Son of Man."

It has been said that if Jesus Christ had never performed on earth any miracles to convince people of his divinity, those who had the inestimable privilege of being once in his presence would have been convinced, as Nathanael was, of his right to reign over men's hearts.

In a beautiful figure, Emerson pictured the high dignity and force of great manhood: "O Iole! How did you know that Hercules was a god?" "Because," answered Iole, "I was content the moment my eyes fell upon him. When I beheld Theseus, I desired that I might see him offer battle, or at least guide his horses in the chariot race; but Hercules did not wait for a contest; he conquered where he stood, or walked, or sat, or whatever thing he did."

Jesus conquered by the transcendent greatness of his being. None have ever yet been capable of perfectly representing his character, which shines by its own light across the ages. He was appointed by Almighty God to stand for an eternal fact — the sovereignty of manhood, and the imperishable value of the human soul. Wherever life has burned low, and distrust of the high mission of humanity has crept in, the fresh return to Jesus has brought again into balance the thought of the race. Of all meditations, one is supreme. In the words of Thomas à Kempis —addressed to his Saviour—"It is Thee! It is Thee!" C. S. C.

The Breaking of Hard Hearts

WEDNESDAY, July 26. Zech. 12:1-14. "They shall look on me whom they pierced." This vision apparently refers to a time yet future, when the Hebrew race shall be restored to the land of their fathers, and Gentile nations shall be gathered in battle against them. The Lord's words to Caiaphas will then be fulfilled: "Ye shall see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven." "Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they which pierced him, and all the tribes of the earth shall mourn over him. Even so, Amen." But whilst this is the prophetic aspect of these remarkable words, is there not a personal application? It is the aspect of the suffering Christ which elicits tears of genuine repentance. "They shall look on Him whom they have pierced and mourn," writes the beloved apostle, who, standing beside the cross, saw the soldier pierce his side, so that the blood and water of a broken heart poured forth. This is the fact which the Spirit of God makes use of for the breaking of hard hearts. They are broken on the broken heart of Jesus.

There are two kinds of sorrow—the one to death, the other to life. The first is caused by the penalty of wrong-doing, and is largely selfish; the second considers the Person against whom the wrong has been done, and bitterly judges the baseness of sin by the thought of the shame and sorrow brought to the heart of Jesus. The deepest penitence comes after we have known the Saviour. The eyes that first look to him for salvation may be tearless, but they will not long remain so. Perhaps we may say that there is a difference between repentance and penitence. The one is of the will, the other of the heart. To repent is the definite act of a moment, when we turn from sin to God: but penitence will be our companion to the gates of day. F. B. M.

God Wants Our Whole Life—Not a Part

THURSDAY, July 27. Ps. 139:7. "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence?" Some years ago, I visited some people belonging to a singular sect in a Western state, who refused to have organ music in their home or in their church, since this, to their minds, introduced a secular element into religion. A man of our acquaintance is the most punctilious person imaginable regarding what any one should or should not do in a church; but there seems to be little or no reverence left for the business office and the persons he meets in the outside world. All this clear-cut division between the sacred and the secular seems to be annihilated by the word of the psalmist, that the Spirit of God is all-pervading, and it is impossible to escape it wherever we are, whatever we do.

In the words of the seer who saw in vision splendid the new City of God from Patmos: "I beheld no temple therein." When we come to appreciate that the Spirit of God is not shut up in our particular church, or in any temple made with hands; when we come more fully into the light of Jesus' saying that "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth," then his presence will be in every place, and every day will be God's day.

Why should we call our moral duties mere morality, distinguishing them from our spiritual exercises? Is not my morality a part of my spiritual growth, and is it not an attempt to flee from God's presence to build such walls between my integrity and my religion? The Bible erects no such walls. It claims all the life for God. All work is his work. All real joy is his joy. My aspirations and ideals are prayers. My hopes are faith. My duties are worship of the most impressive kind. I would write God's name on the commonplace things of life. If God is in my life at all, is he not in every part of it? C. S. C.

All Need the Cleansing Fountain

FRIDAY, July 28. Zech. 13:1-6. "There shall be a fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness." The hymn reminds us that "the dying thief rejoiced to see that fountain in his day"; but the singer goes on to confess that he who had spent an apparently blameless life needed the same cleansing. We all need it, day by day, as we walk in the light, even as God is light; and as the illuminating ray falls on our hearts, we have to betake ourselves to the cleansing typified by the flowing fountain of the prophet's vision. It sprang up from the pierced heart of Christ and has been flowing ever since. "Blessed are they that wash their robes, that they may have a right to the tree of life, and enter in through the gates."

And when that cleansing by the water and blood is thoroughly effected, then, as here, the old idols we once worshiped cease to charm. Their very names are forgotten and cease to inspire, and the prophets and unclean spirit pass out of the horizon of the soul. We are constrained by the love of Christ, and take him to be, not Priest alone, but Prophet. He unveils to us the mysteries of God, and becomes our sole Teacher, Leader, and Guide. The passion of the regenerated nation would become so intense that the prophets would fear to own their profession, and would prefer to class themselves as plowmen or slaves. When shall we learn that lesson? When shall we be so occupied with Jesus that all other voices shall cease to charm? F. B. M.

The Soul's Song of Victory

SATURDAY, July 29. Ps. 90:9, 14. "We spend our years as a tale that is told. O satisfy us early with thy mercy." Moses, the first hymnist of Israel, has completed his wonderful career. As he reviews his life, he sees the eastern mountains purpled with the splendor of God's guidance, power, wisdom and blessing, while the western hills are resplendent with coming glories, beckoning the weary, aged desert traveler to the refuge of rest,

Where everlasting spring abides,
And never withering flowers.

Moses' song has been sung around the dying beds of millions for thirty-five hundred years, and read as appropriate words at the final services over departed loved ones. This psalm is a balm to the wounded heart, a comfort to the sorrowing, a solace to the aged, a hope for the sinful, a cheer for the dying. It encourages wisdom, faithful toil, true devotion; it calls on God for mercy, for holiness and guidance. It gives a thrilling picture of the brevity of the present and the everlastingness of the future. It recognizes that he who attends to the creation and continuance of the universe will not forget his human children. Moses no doubt had visions of the coming Messiah, whose beauty of holiness and merciful loving-kindness he invoked in this psalm. "He endured as seeing Him who is invisible." "And he esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt." He knew our Lord would assume all our liabilities, and become the head of the firm of "God and Humanity," that we might become joint heirs with him to his unsearchable riches.

The new hymn of immortals in glory is the "song of Moses and the Lamb," uniting the Old and New Testament heroes in one glorious anthem of redemption. On Sinai Moses cried: "Show me thy glory." On Nebo his prayer was fully answered, when angels bore him to the dwelling-place of the Almighty.

Christians and War

WAR is the great moral problem of the world. Next to the divine message of salvation for man, there is no subject so vital to the welfare of the human race, and certainly none to which the Bible Christian should give more earnest consideration, than the teaching of human brotherhood and universal peace.

We are frequently asked to define what we regard as the attitude of the Bible Christian on war. God has implanted in the heart of man a courage and in his limbs a strength to enable him to defend himself against savage and destructive forces that cannot be restrained by reason or by love. He has given him also a conscience to discern right from wrong, good from evil. His own Son, the Prince of Peace, has taught us that all men are brothers. Nations, too, are endowed with consciences to bear on the moral problems that are involved in international relations, and the operation of the national conscience is an important step in the education of the world.

War has held dominion since the beginning of history. It is the ultimate visible expression of the power of evil; the will of the "prince of this world," who has grasped universal dominion, and of whom Christ spoke: "Hereafter I will not talk much with you: for the prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me." (John 14: 30.)

It is a sad commentary on the grasp war has on the world that all history should be chiefly devoted to the records of innumerable wars and the frightful cruelty and suffering they have involved. How the early church regarded them in apostolic days may be gathered from the condemnation of war found in the fourth chapter of the Epistle of James. Wars, according to the Christian Fathers, were of the devil, not of God, and assuredly not of Christ; for he had said: "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight: but now is my kingdom not from hence." The Christian, owning allegiance to a heavenly kingdom, and having a heavenly citizenship, was bound therefore by the example and teachings of the Master to oppose war and to use conciliation. This is the attitude of the Bible Christian today. But in this age he recognizes that it is impossible to realize world-peace in the perfect and abiding sense. There are worldly authorities to be recognized and to whom obedience must be rendered. And here we recall the prayer of Jesus for his followers: "I pray not that thou shouldest take them from the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil one. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." And while we pray "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," we express what the whole Christian Church desires, the coming of the kingdom in the hearts of men, which will end the great wickedness of war and bring in the era of universal brotherhood.

This is the peace for which Bible Christians stand. They believe it is on the way and they work for it and pray for it. It is continually upon their hearts, and they know that eventually it will come. The great transforming processes of God may be slow, but they are sure. Here a little and there a little, the groups of believers multiply, until they become a great army marching under the Commander whose banner is Peace, not for conquest or destruction, but for kindness and rehabilitation and the spreading of the grand truth that God is the universal Father, that we are his children, and that therefore we cannot desire to kill one another, since there is in our hearts no foundation for race or international hatred.

We hear much of a general desire throughout the world for peace, and we are willing to believe it. Yet the desire is not sufficiently deep-seated to bring the world to pay the price for peace. It means the surrender of pride, of national and racial arrogance and superiority; the giving up of old antagonisms and hatreds; the recognition of international brotherhood, the end of all the passions and jealousies and envyings that have kept nations at strife so long. In a word, it means a complete transfer of allegiance from the prince of this world to the Prince of Peace.

Since the present war the campaign of education on world-peace has been making progress. Many American churches are participating. The basis of the movement is the Christian ideal of universal brotherhood and the world-scope of the Kingdom. This is the great truth which Christ has given to men and upon which he founded his religion. "One is your Father," he said, "and all ye are brethren. It hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy; but I say unto you, Love your enemies, and love thy neighbor as thyself." Peace is the keynote of the Sermon on the Mount—peace and love.

It is a high ideal which Jesus set for his followers, the ideal which is designed to transform the globe. But the transforming process is yet hardly begun, and only a comparatively small proportion of those living today know the peace ideal. Hence the Bible Christian, holding firmly to his faith, must yet be prepared for occasions when the old and the new principles sharply conflict. He knows that the pagan doctrine of force will give way very slowly. He knows that wars will come. But he also knows that while wars and offenses must come, those through whom they come will alone be responsible and none else. So, recognizing these conditions, he yields obedience to the laws of the land in which he lives and does his duty as a citizen. Thus it happens that we find even in the ranks many men whose Christianity cannot be doubted, and who, while in the world, are not of it, but are true sons of the Kingdom.

The teachings of Jesus, apparently forgotten in the early turmoil and excitement of the world-war, are today exercising a mightier influence than ever. Christians everywhere are convinced that had these teachings as set forth in the Gospels been heeded, Europe would not now be mourning for her dead millions, her ruined cities and her wretchedness.

Meat Production and High Prices

THERE are few nations so strongly addicted to meat-eating as the Americans. It is not surprising, therefore, that the prevailing high prices of meat should be productive of a general protest. One of the most enlightening statements of the situation is furnished in a report just issued by the Department of Agriculture at Washington, which explains that a factor in the advance in prices is that the increased meat production, while considerable, has been more than exceeded by the increase in population of the meat-eating lands. To this must be added the increased cost of production and the very general decline of the purchasing power of the money unit. There is one feature of the case which deserves serious consideration: the annual loss of cattle through disease. For sixteen years past, this loss in the United States has averaged 1,475,000 beef cattle, while 1,500,000 additional have perished from exposure. In a single year, 1914, it is estimated that 7,000,000 hogs were lost through cholera. For the last two years our meat imports have exceeded the exports. While we are the largest meat-producing country, our enormous losses and excessive importations have more than offset the increased production. Hence, there is no prospect of lower prices near at hand. The outlook for the family table in average homes is not encouraging, as far as meat is concerned; but it is consoling to reflect that the abundance of fruit, vegetables and cereals at reasonable prices during the summer will afford a more healthful if somewhat less stimulating diet, and one that is better on the whole for the average citizen.

The Mexican Crisis Ended

NOW that the Mexican crisis is safely past, and that the hope indulged of a peaceful solution of the troubles promises to be happily fulfilled, there is a general feeling of relief. With the overwhelming majority of our people, the idea of war with Mexico has never been one that awakened the slightest indications of popular approval. The public has regarded it as a case in which they could see no good reason for urging the country into war over a series of misunderstandings which were partly due to ourselves. It is well known that there were certain interests which were conspiring to drag us into war. The government knew this even better than the people themselves and a bolder, clearer, more definite policy in Washington might have saved infinite trouble. When the latest crisis came, the popular judgment was that none of the issues at stake were incapable of amicable adjustment; but it had suited the policy of Carranza to make a warlike demonstration, and when this had served its purpose, and our last note containing certain specific demands was received, the First Chief was ready to listen to calmer counsels. His reply to our note is couched in cordial and reasonable terms and expresses a willingness to meet the wishes of our government and even to accept mediation should we so desire, or to treat the whole matter through diplomacy. He makes no demand for the immediate withdrawal of our forces, but trusts that both the American and Mexican troops will do nothing further to "aggravate the situation." We may now look forward to the establishment of a better understanding between the two governments than has existed any time during the last four years.

Our own government will doubtless meet Mexico half way in an effort to arrange matters w out further friction. Should the accumulating evi nce of the death of Villa be accepted, it may pro an important factor in the coming negotiations. I hay now suit the purposes of the Washington Ad nistration to take the view that, our mission acro the border having been accomplished, there is no l ger any necessity for our punitive forces remaini on Mexican soil, and a leisurely withdrawal will pro bly follow. Having once been brought to the ve of war, causes of friction, such as those that led t the recent clash of outposts at Carrizal, will be av ed.

For weeks past the country has been in a st of tension owing to the military preparations in a the states. This will now be relaxed, and althoug our camps along the border may be scenes of activi for a time, the whole situation will gradually retu to fairly normal conditions, unless indeed some acident should be seized by the advocates of int ention to create new trouble. Meanwhile we trus hat our government will make its attitude concerni our future dealings with Mexico sufficiently clear an efinite to be fully understood. If we really star for peace and high ideals, the fact should be stat in terms that are not susceptible of misinterpret on. There have been times in the past when the ple felt that Washington was steadily drifting int var without sufficient cause.

The one essential point gained in the new n e is that it averts war, for the time at least, and br s a peaceful solution of the whole controversy rly within sight. Now, if we can steer a straight ath without needless misunderstandings and misa entures, we shall have the satisfaction of reachi an honorable and enduring settlement, a termi ion which will afford gratification to the entire co ry.

National Labor Temple Dedicate

PRESIDENT WILSON, official head o the United States, and President Gompers, o cial head of the three million organized la ers of the United States, united in dedicating the m nificent Labor Temple at Washington on the Fou of July. The building, erected at the cost of $100,000 s to be the new home of the American Federation of L or.

Some of the utterances of President Wilson o his occasion are worthy of special note. He p sed heartily that section of the Clayton Act whic has been hailed by the hosts of labor and their le ers with delight and which holds that "labor is t a commodity to be bought and sold." "I am so y," said Mr. Wilson, "that there were any judges i the United States who had to be told that. It is s obvious that it seems to me that that section o the Clayton Act were a return to the primer of h an liberty; but if judges have to have the primer o ned before them, I am willing to open it." The Cl on Act has put an end to the contention that labor u ons and combinations are in violation of the She an Anti-Trust Law.

Referring to the many conflicts between ca tal and labor, President Wilson expressed the belief hat these contests were occasioned by an absen of common counsel and common understanding bet een the exploiters and the exploited. He believed hat absentee capitalism is at the basis of most o the struggles of the working people for higher w es, shorter hours and improved conditions of labor enerally. He declared: "Capital is owned and ontrolled by many who have not taken the pains go and see the workers at their work and know just hat their circumstances are."

Reiterating his conviction that America's du is to serve the world, the President said: "Americ did not come into existence to make one more eat nation of the family of nations, to show its str gth and to exercise mastery. America opened her ors to everybody who wanted to be free and to hav the same opportunity that everybody else had, to ke the most of his faculties and opportunities. nd America will retain its greatness only so long it retains and seeks to realize those ideals. No an ought to suffer injustice in America. No man oug in America, to fail to see the deep dictates of human y."

Upon the site of the new Labor Temple there ormerly stood an old mansion, in the rear of whic as a slave pen. Thus upon the very spot wher he horrors of the old system of chattel slavery wer experienced is made to stand the new temple of a ver and higher freedom which the workers of Am ica are destined to achieve.

"Excessive partiality for one foreign nation, nd excessive dislike for another, cause those w om they actuate to see danger only on one sid"—George Washington.

Tree-Planting Machine

A MACHINE which plants from 10,000 to 15,000 forest tree seedlings a day is being used at Letchworth Park forest and arboretum, in Wyoming County, N. Y., according to officials of the forest service. Previously the planting has been done by hand at the rate of 1,200 to ,500 trees daily each man. The machine was designed to set out cabbage and tomato plants, but works equally well with trees. It is about the size of an ordinary mowing machine and is operated by three men and two horses. One man drives the team while the other two handle the seedlings. The machine makes a furrow in which the trees are set at any desired distance, and an automatic device indicates where they should be dropped. Two metal-tired wheels push the roots. This is a very desirable feature, it is said, because the trees are apt to die if this is not well done. Two attachments make it possible to place water and fertilizer at the roots of each seedling. Another attachment marks the line on which the next row of trees is to be planted. Officials say the cost will be much less than when the planting is done by hand. It is stated the machine can be used on any land which has been cleared and is not too rough to plow and harrow. The slaughter of the forests, causing drought and damage to the crops, has made it necessary to plant trees everywhere to stop the waste. The increasing profit of fruit-raising has prompted the planting of orchards of various kinds by the wholesale. The science of agriculture, in the front rank of applying useful art, now comes along with this tree-planting device which is attracting the attention of the national government. Tree planting is as old as the Garden of Eden. "And God said, Behold, I have given you . . . every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat." (Gen. 1 9.)

Dyes from India

THE departments of industry in Mysore and Madras are endeavoring to learn to what extent the present shortage of synthetic dyes can be made good with the natural dyestuffs of vegetable origin that were formerly employed. The work has been carried out mainly in the laboratories of the applied chemistry department of the Indian Institute of Science. The materials dealt with in the investigation included chay root, nuna, ventilago bark, rubia cordifolia, red sandalwood, sappan wood, cutch, divi-divi and other tannin materials, annatto, kamala, lac and Wrightia tinctoria leaves. Concerning annatto, the report says: "The dye obtained from jabara seeds was tested upon bleached mercerized cotton, upon which it gives a pleasing rich orange shade. The method of dyeing is simple, consisting in working the yarn in a warm silkaline bath made by extracting the dye from the dried seeds with water and then adding a little carbonate of soda or potash. The dyeing is finished by giving a weak bath of acid and rinsing. It is generally assumed that the shades given by annatto are not fast, but I find that the fastness properties are equal to those of many of the bright aniline dyes which have been so largely used, and there is no reason why, if the shade is liked, the material should not find a more extended use upon silk and cotton materials, in which brightness of color is a consideration." Among the offerings commanded by God through Moses were "gold, and silver, and brass, and blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats' hair, and rams' skins dyed red." (Ex. 25 : 3-5.)

Largest Statue in Cuba

THE Maceo monument, which was recently unveiled in Cuba, is the largest work of the kind ever undertaken in that island. It is built of American and Carrara marble and embellished with bronze figures cast in Spain. The total cost, including construction, was $150,000. T. Estrada Palma, Maceo and other statesmen who founded and maintained the Cuban republic deserve the gratitude of friends of liberty everywhere. But the real father of the prosperous little republic is "Uncle Sam," who freed it from oppression and then nursed it into a healthy self-supporting nation, clearing up its physical pestilences and inspiring the people with new life, prosperity and happiness. It is a good sign of national thrift when fine art is cultivated, and when there is proper recognition of public servants. The Hebrews built a stone monument in commemoration of their opening of the waters of Jordan to the Ark of the Covenant. "And these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel forever." (Joshua 4 : 7.)

Sheep Going to Slaughter

MOST artists picture sheep as important figures in pastoral scenes. They are represented as out in the velvety green fields and by the beautiful silvery streams, the expression of innocence and contentment. Other artists represent them safe from the snowstorm in the sheepfold. In the picture on our page the artist has painted the same innocent sheep, but on their way to the slaughter There is no look of discontent or of fear. They do not know where they are going or how soon their end will come. Most of the slaughtering of animals for food in this country is done in Chicago, Kansas City and other Western cities. But a considerable amount of it is done in the East, and in the metropolitan district. The meat of sheep and lambs is palatable and healthful, and enormous quantities are required for the city markets. As the sheep in the picture are being unloaded for the slaughter house they pass over the shadow of a telegraph or telephone pole which with the crosspiece makes the figure of a cross on the ground. This makes the picture a peculiarly proper one for the center of the Bible and Newspaper page. That symbol is the center and circumference, the soul and the substance of the whole paper; the innocent Lamb of God dying on the Cross for the sins of the world, and for our individual salvation for time and eternity is for the Bible and Newspaper page the center and inspiration of thought, affection and practical service for God and fellow men. The passing of the sheep to their death past the shadow of a cross on the ground suggests the story of the chancellor of the exchequer of the empire of Ethiopia, who came a journey of a thousand miles to find about Christ, and who through the guidance of the evangelist found the Saviour while reading this verse: "He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before his shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth." (Isa. 53 : 7.)

Unfaithful Lighthouses

A WIRELESS message has been sent broadcast to ships at sea warning them not to be guided by all lighthouses on the Mexican coasts, the Navy Department announced recently. A few of the lights have been extinguished and the characteristics of others changed so that dependence cannot be placed on them. The State Department has been advised that port officials on the Mexican east coast are preparing to impede any landing by American troops. Harbor lights and lighthouse signals on the east coast of Yucatan and elsewhere have been extinguished for some time. All along the shores of time God has set up lighthouses to warn of dangerous rocks, to guide them into harbor channels, and to save precious lives. To put out the signal lights or to change them so they will deceive the mariner and bring death instead of life is the especial delight of the wicked one, and the pathetic fact is that so many are wrecked by this deceit. To obscure conscience, the light of the soul, or pervert it so that the danger signal is changed to "safety"; to obscure Christ, or substitute some other light for him as a guide, causes untold wrecks along the shores of time. There is this promise of the Messiah, the true light: "I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the end of the earth." (Isa. 49 : 6.)

Tide of Immigration Renewed

AFTER the war had fairly started the tide of immigration decreased until it was at the lowest ebb in recent years. It was not supposed that there would be any appreciable increase during the continuance of the great conflict in Europe. But already there is a reaction and it would not be surprising if it should continue to grow larger month by month and year by year. For instance, figures made public in Washington by the Department of Labor show that 27,000 aliens reached American shores during the month of March. This is 11 per cent. more than in the preceding month and 43 per cent. more than in March of last year. Italy heads the list, but Greece, England, Ireland, the Scandinavian countries and Germany are represented. One Italian ship which arrived in New York during the week brought nearly 2,000 immigrants. These facts go to show that the United States will continue to be regarded as the land of promise, and this in spite of the forecasters and economists who have insisted that the loss of so many millions of able-bodied men would put labor at a premium in all of the countries of Europe. Despite the universal patriotism and loyalty of the citizens of the contending nations the awful slaughter has made the common people very sick of the war, and the tide of immigration that is renewed marks the general desire to get over to our country where the practical arts can be carried on under the flag of peace. Our nation is strong because it is made up of the best elements from the best countries of the world. It will be fortunate if immigration shall only be so great that we shall be able to digest it, for undigested immigration, like undigested food for the individual, is bad for the nation. When it comes to the make-up of our population what was said of Jehovah's care for his ancient Israel can be applied to our own land. "He hath not dealt so with any nation." (Ps. 147 : 20.)

Beavers Plug Drain Pipe

PILED up at the lower end of the beaver inclosure in the Bronx Zoological Gardens are a cord or two of sticks varying from a few inches to two feet in length. There is also a ton or more of every imaginable sort of rubbish. These things represent the protest of the beavers against some ideas of the park authorities about what is neat and orderly.

When the beaver inclosure was built a nice new pond was constructed, and to keep it from overflowing, a pipe was installed at the lower end to serve as a spillway. The Forestry Department knew the beavers would build across the pond. The pond was completed a year ago and the beavers built a dam according to contract a month or so later.

But the busy little animals developed a grudge against the pipe. As soon as they saw they couldn't make the pond overflow they went to work to stop up the drain pipe. Two weeks after the dam was built the attendants saw the water rising over the banks. An investigation showed the pipe had been plugged with twigs and mud. It was cleared, only to be blocked again. Now the beavers have learned to do the job more quickly and the pipe has to be cleaned out every two days. How wisely has God endowed the lower tribes with instincts for self preservation!

The element of moral evil makes it harder for man to obey the dictates of reason and of conscience than for the lower tribes to follow the leadings of instinct. Christ referred to the home-making instincts of animals to illustrate his own homelessness in these words: "Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head." (Luke 9 : 58.)

When the Soul Speaks

By L. D. STEARNS

MRS. DEAN stepped slowly into the clear, bright sunshine and stood a moment, hand on knob, glancing appraisingly about. Then she closed the door. "I declare," said she, "seems as if a body never could get time to breathe."

Her face was sallow and thin; her lips drew closely together; her sparse, gray hair was drawn tightly from her high brow. Now her gaze wandered to the brick walk, strewn with fallen leaves. The boisterous November wind caught a wisp of hair and whipped it about one faded cheek. "Seems," she soliloquized, half absently, "as if Hilda might, at least, sweep off those leaves without being told."

The next instant a flare of sudden wrath sent a faint reddish tinge to her gaunt face. "I don't know what you're such a fool as to keep her for, Jane Dean," she accused sharply. "She ain't neither kith nor kin; and goodness knows, she ain't no sort o' use—moonin' and mopin' over the pianner, or some book, instead of sweepin' and dustin' and doin' chores." A second she stood musing, looking off into space; then, with quick steps and decisive manner, she turned toward the house.

As she opened the door, which led directly into the big living-room, a girl, standing by the window, turned toward her. Her hair, a shimmering mass of gold, was piled high. Her eyes were wide and bright; her cheeks, like the faint damask of a newly opened rose. But the corners of her mouth drooped dejectedly; her face, fashioned like some rare flower, was marred by a discontented frown.

"I hate November!" The words sounded like pent-up, escaping steam. She reached for the duster, lying carelessly at her feet. "I hate dusting! and studying! and living! and—and—everything!"

"Oh, no, ye don't, Hilda." Mrs. Dean's voice held a thin edge of sarcasm. "Ye don't hate moonin' over the pianner."

THE damask in the cheeks of the girl turned suddenly to flaming red. The blue eyes deepened, seemingly, into black. Her lips quivered. "I do! I do!" she affirmed vehemently, "'cause that's what makes everything else so bad! I'd run away today, and never so much as look at you again, Aunt Jane, if mother hadn't made me promise I'd stay until I graduated from high school. She said you'd such a kind heart, and always loved to make folks happy! I guess," the red lips curling scornfully, "she didn't know!"

"Goodness knows"—the tone was sharp—"I'd not be bothered having you about, trying to teach yer things of common decent livin', if I hadn't promised to do it until ye graduated. As for yer mother—thank goodness, she was only your stepmother. If my sister Nell had given such a good-for-nothin' to the world I'd not have her for sister o' mine." Crossing to the kitchen, she slammed the door.

She went briskly across to the shed and took the broom from its corner. "Whatever Nell could see in a dreamin' good-for-nothin' like her," she declared, crossing the yard and starting a vigorous assault on the leaves, "is beyond me!" Then, suddenly, she stood quite still.

The bright autumn sun seemed to touch her gray hair almost mockingly. The faded eyes looked far off, at something the bright-haired girl, standing inside by the window, could not see. One worn hand closed a little tighter about the broom.

"Always loved to make folks happy!"

The rustling leaves at her feet whispered it. The boisterous wind shouted it. The shutters, creaking in the fast-growing gale, seemed to thunder it.

THE face of the woman appeared, for a fleeting second, to grow strangely soft; something almost akin to the expression on the face of the girl lighted it. Then, as though touched by sudden frost, it hardened. Her shoulders lifted, and straightened into an aggressive line. "No," —the words rang sharp, incisive; "thank God, she didn't know!"

Turning, she walked briskly to the house.

There was no hint of sharpness, now, in her manner. It was merely cold; hard. Putting the broom in place, she returned to the living-room, crossing directly to the piano with almost studied deliberation, and with a sharp, decisive click closed it, turning the key and dropping it into her pocket. "I never could abide shilly-shallying," she announced. "I guess we'll cut it out. After this, you'll do the dishes three times a day, Hilda Emmons, and the dustin', and sweep off the walk. I s'pose," thoughtfully, "that's enough, for regular work, seein' as you're in school. I've no notion of forgettin' my promise to your stepmother."

Meditatively she glanced at the slender figure in the drab cotton gown. "But," said she, "if you want anything for graduation, except gingham, you'll have to earn it—and make it, too!" A second her eyes rested steadily on the blue ones, wide and bright with anger and dismay; then she turned, and, crossing leisurely to a chair, tipped the big gray cat out of it, and sitting down reached for a piece of gray print, beginning with swift sureness to cut and measure breadths.

"There's Saturdays and holidays, and vacations, in plenty," declared she, "before June. There's cleanin' to be done; and ironin' and cookin'. I'm gettin' old and need a rest. If you want to settle down to work I'll pay you twenty cents an hour, same's I pay Hannah Jones, when she comes in. And I'll help you cut and make your dress, if you earn enough to buy it. And that pianner'll stay locked." Her voice was quietly grim and determined.

Selecting two spools of gray cotton from her basket, she matched one to the dingy print in her lap. "If you earn enough for pink instead of gray for your next dress, you'll have to do the washin' yourself," she said coldly. "I won't!"

WITH an even fiercer shake than before, the wind batted against the glass. Fresh billows of leaves filled the yard. The waning day shut down into chill grayness. A few flakes of snow scurried through the air.

With an unconscious shiver the girl turned toward the closed piano. A lump was in her throat. The clicking of the lock seemed to have shut out everything worth while in life. The small, sensitive hands clinched. Suddenly, she felt like screaming; running away; anything, to get out of reach of the grim-lipped woman who sat working so steadily on the gray print gown.

How she hated it! gray! always gray!

Then, quite suddenly, she raised her head. The months rolled away as if by magic. Once again she seemed looking into the eyes of the woman who had been mother and father in one, listening to the loved voice. "Never think you've lost me, childie. I'll be watching and loving until you come. And remember, there's a bit of God i your soul, dear. Let it guide."

When the dusting was quite fi shed she hung the cloth in its accus med place, and going out softly clos the door. Mechanically she reach for an old shawl and threw it abo her shoulders. Then she went swift out into the chilly fall night. The wind stung an beat her; but she did not heed. The snow, now ling heavily, bit savagely at her soft cheeks and fted about her golden hair.

On! on!

She was running now. As she turned in, a ast, at the gate of the old churchyard a sob choke her. It took so long—to reach the beloved grave. eeling, she pressed her cheek against the cold one "Mother! Mother!" she cried passionately, "I ant to die! I want to die!"

"A bit of God in your soul, dear. Let it gi le!"

The words seemed to pierce her heart. U onsciously she raised her eyes to the leaden sky. Oh," she sobbed, "I haven't any mother! I haven any music! I haven't anything, God!" Befor her despairing gaze the clouds, borne on cha eful breezes, drifted this way, that, until they m entarily took the form of a cross, and as she zed startled, a presence that was sweet, and warn and very real, seemed all about her.

Her breath came fast. Once again she wa the little girl, on her knees, in the dear old home, hispering, with simple faith, "I've been naughty. ow, I'll be good!" Childishly she clasped her l ds. "O God," she whispered clearly, "I forgot. Now I'll try and remember to be good."

The clouds broke, drifting again into a sha less mass. "Mother, dear," she murmured, he ace lifted reverently to the gray sky, "after all I've God!" Then a second time she prayed, with mple and direct faith, "O God, help me to please Aun ane —to want to please her! and oh," a little l ken wistfulness threaded through her voice, "if he'd only, only like me, just a little bit, please, God!"

WHEN she opened the door of the big living oom an hour later Mrs. Dean was still work g on the gray print dress.

As Hilda entered she glanced sharply up hen her gaze traveled slowly from the damp ha and white face down the length of the wet gray irt, and back to the steady shining eyes. "I ould think it might be a good plan to get into mething dry," she said crisply. "Where'v you been? In the river?"

"A bit of God in the soul, dear. Let it g le."

Like a bit of rare, sweet music the rds sounded through the girl's brain. Her yes deepened and widened with the quick, war impulse that touched her. Crossing swiftl she dropped to her knees, her hands resting l tly against the older woman's breast. Her ace, all smiles and tears, was lifted to the grim, ded one. "Aunt Jane," she whispered, "I've een horrid—horrid! I didn't think anything all the world mattered, except—me. But just now, out by mother's grave, I saw—a oss! and I remembered—God!" Unchecked, ear splashed to the crumpled gray mass benea her elbows. The next one she winked reso tely away. "I'll try and not mind the music, d—missing mother—so much, Aunt Jane," sh said slowly. "And you shan't pay me for work. I'm going to help because—my soul—says—I ust. And I'll wear gingham for graduation, Aunt ne, gray and all!"

She dropped her head. She was sc ing brokenly now.

The slow ticking of the clock in the op site corner seemed keeping time to the dull obbing in the heart of the grim-lipped woma

The Cross!

A moment, her eyes were raised to the ray sky showing dimly from the opposite wi ow; then, leaning forward, her arms encircle the girl and held her close—the child of the w an who had come between her and all she held ear, long ago.

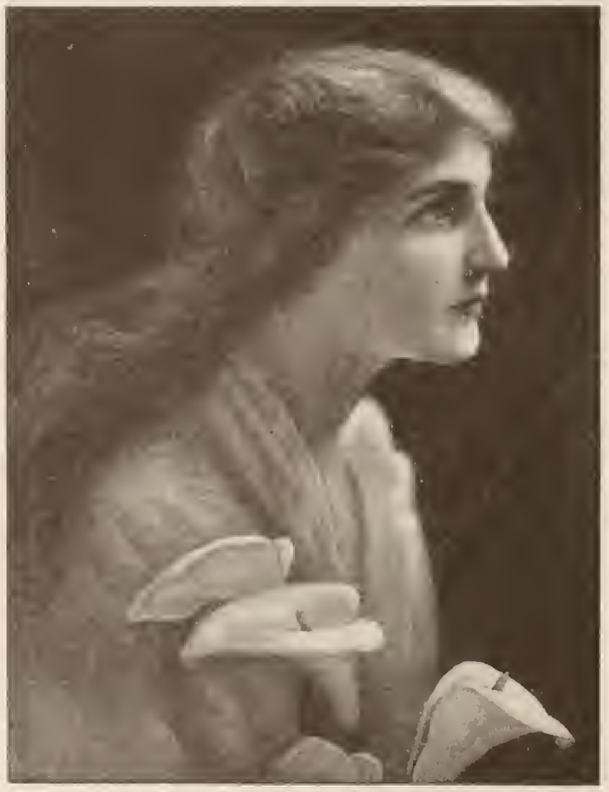
Bit by bit, the grim lips relaxed and some ing faded slowly from the care-worn face. "fter all"—her voice was strange and low—' hat else matters, when one remembers the cr s?"

With quick motion she raised the wet fac and smoothing back the golden hair kissed it tly. "You are like some one I loved long ago,' aid she, her lips twisting, her eyes smiling "I guess we'll both be happier, child, if we l our souls speak,"—and now it was the wom of whom her sister had said, "she loves to ake folks happy."

Rising, she crossed to the telephone and led a number. "My niece is set on music, Profe or," she said briskly, "and we ought to cul ate what's in the soul. Please call and see us."

Turning, she glanced at the clock. "T re's no use letting the soul speak," she rem ked grimly, "if a body don't follow its advice. To-night's open night. Change your clothes, ild, while I get you a bite of supper, and we' run down to Nelson's and see if we can get h of a pretty rose-pink gown."



Virtue's Face

Verse and Painting by Nelson Gardner

As shining as a star is Virtue's face,
  For close is her communion with the sky;
  And more is she endowed than things that die,
For high as even heaven is her place;
And hath not any lily so much grace
  As centers in her soul, while from her eye
  Wells forth the stainless radiance whereby
Is darkness banished from our groping race.

Beauty hath she, and out of earthly clay
  Builds she a body that transcends the beast;
And if therein she undisturbed could stay,
  Might never worms upon such temple feast;
For health is in her home, and always blest
Is that abode wherein is she a guest.

A Free School of Culture

By

WILLIAM B. ASHLEY

EVERY normal person becomes ambitious to improve. One of the earliest inventions for the inculcation of this ambition in the youthful breast was the bath-tub. In the early stage of the progress of the race, the bath-tubs of Saturday night were the wash-tubs of Monday morning, and the same cake of pungent yellow soap did duty on both occasions; but at which end of the week that home-made soap contributed most to the culture of the race, might be open to debate. The protests with which juvenile masculinity submitted to such cultural beginnings indicate to some extent how empty of ambition to be cultured is the human breast at the stage. And if we will look back to that bare period in our lives, and then pause to consider how many things we now insist upon as necessary to our comfort, our well-being, our self-respect, our usefulness in the world, we shall gain some idea of the big place that our revolutionary force has made for itself in human affairs.

I have chosen to call that revolutionary force a "School of Culture." It is more generally known as "Advertising." The three most potent factors in life today are religion, education and advertising. Let a man be religious and educated and an advertiser, and he is bound to succeed. And his success is largely due to the fact that other men and women who are religious and educated read his advertising. So the triangle is complete, and touches with its three sides, to greater or less extent, all of us who on earth do dwell.

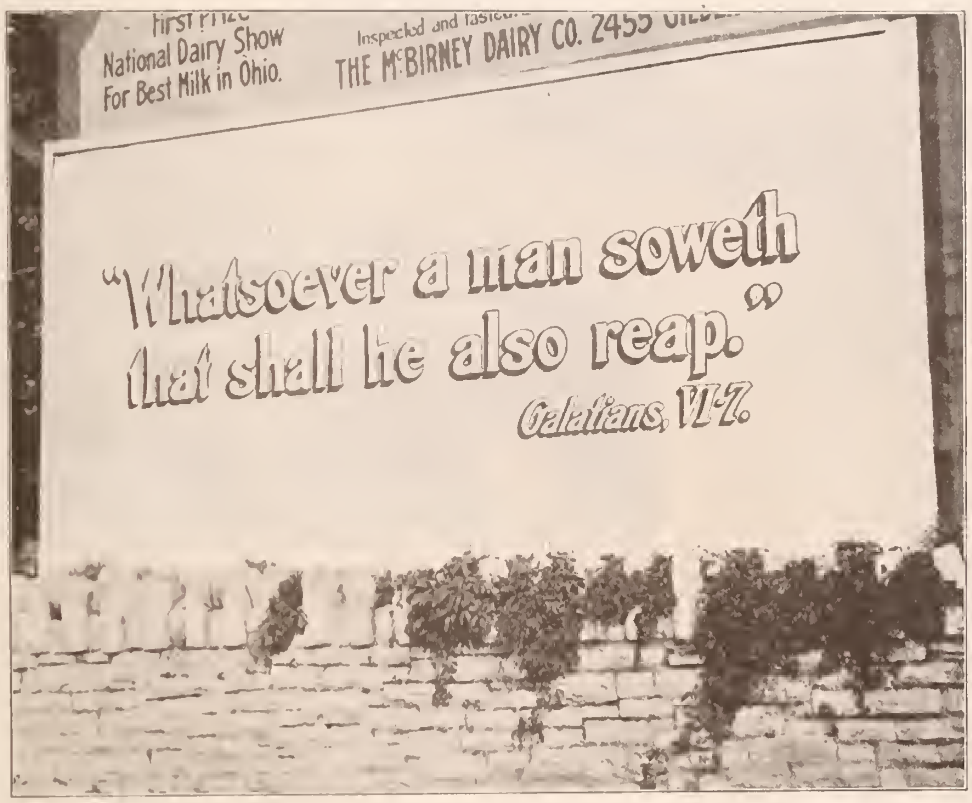
And even as the great religious bodies have been holding their annual conventions, and the National Education Association its convention, so the advertising men of the country came together for the consideration of their problems in the city of Philadelphia from June 25 to June 30. And it might in a way surprise some people to be told that the latter Convention may have as important results upon the life of the American people as will either of the others.

THIS was the Twelfth Annual Convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, and was twelve times as interesting as the first. The reason for that is the steady and tremendous growth in advertising. And the explanation of that growth is found in the constantly extending prosperity, which brings increasing numbers within reach of those things which make for better living. By no means the least interesting illustration of this is found on the farms of America, where the problems of past generations are being solved by the present workers of the soil, who have been educated by this school of culture in the use of improved tools and scientific methods of agriculture.

The advertising man is the vital connecting link between the producer of something and the consumer of it. Upon him rests the huge responsibility of getting you and me to see that this or that thing is exactly what we ought to have for this or that purpose, and also to see to it that you and I are not misled by false representations.

The profession of the advertising man has taken on a very great deal of importance. New inventions and improvements on old inventions increase by leaps and bounds. Pretty nearly every good commodity is imitated by an inferior one. And commodities of the same kind and equal value, so far as materials and workmanship go, compete with each other in a fair field and must present their respective appeals by emphasis placed on different points of merit. Whether it is soap or automobiles, something must first be said to establish the intrinsic merit of the article itself, and second to convince you and me that this or that particular make of soap or automobile is especially adapted to our peculiar needs.

It would be quite impossible to keep the public informed on the vast output of old and new commodities by any other method than that of advertising. The United States government is perhaps the greatest of all advertisers in this country. Its many departments of research are continually making discoveries in the field of medicine, domestic science, agriculture, forestry, electricity and, in short, every phase of industry, and instantly a valuable discovery of this kind is made, it is advertised by leaflets and in a score of other ways to the interested portion of the population. But the government is the one great producer that does not have to pay for advertising space in the newspaper and magazine world. Newspapers and magazines are quick to spread news of what the government is doing in this or that field. A new fertilizing agent, a better method of canning peaches, the way to build bird houses, methods of cooking eggs, all such subjects treated by the government are reported in the press of the land. This is advertising. It is free publicity. The government of the United States is practically the only producer who is entitled to free publicity. Though it need hardly be said that any great discovery, say in the field of medical cures, if given by the discoverer to the press, is readily reported in the form of news to the public.



A sign of the times—in more senses than one. This appeared recently throughout Cincinnati, but by whom paid for is not disclosed. It applies to advertising as well as to habits, and illustrates what the churches might do if they had a mind for it

But the government is not a manufacturer; it produces ideas. And many of its ideas must be afterward embodied in manufactured products. The government may announce that a certain element has been found to be unusually energizing as a fertilizer for corn. But where will that new fertilizing agent be obtained? Where can it be obtained quickly and at lowest cost and without question as to its quality? Well, that is not for the government to say. That is for friend Advertiser to tell us. A hundred concerns begin to produce this new fertilizing ingredient, and their advertising men begin to tell you and me why we should buy it of this or that producer.

There is scarcely room on this page to catalogue every known article of commerce. Suppose you just jot down on paper some things you would like to have to improve your home or your business or make you personally more comfortable and contented. Now, do you really know that you would like to have one or all of these things? Why do you know it? Well, either because you have seen some one else enjoying them, or else you have read the advertisements about them. Up to now you had not thought seriously perhaps of possessing yourself of any one of these. But now you decide that you want a certain kind of kitchen utensil, or a certain kind of soap, or tire, or paint, or flour. What is the first thing you do? In nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of one thousand you will refer to the advertising columns in your magazines and newspapers. And if you are not determined in advance on what make you want, you will compare the descriptive matter of the different makes. And even if you are certain in advance, and look up the advertisement merely to find out something more particularly about it, the address or something, you are very apt to have your attention drawn to the merits of another make; and so your education goes on through the book stage until you actually make the experiment of purchasing something that you want.

There are millions of people who are doing just that sort of thing a large part of the time. A large percentage of them depend almost absolutely upon advertising matter for their information on what is what in the realm of manufactured products. The advertising columns of reputable magazines are the weekly and monthly letters addressed by manufacturers to the persons who may want their goods. The advertising men write those letters. Probably the greatest examples of concentrated language are found in the advertisements that appear in the Christian Herald and other periodicals. Solely as examples of the persuasive use of English, they are well worth studying. They represent the best that these manufacturers, these producers of books and padlocks and flower seeds and lubricating oil can say to you about their goods, for it is their chief medium of sure communication with you. All the wheels of industry are kept running by these advertisements. All the wheels of domestic comfort and individual success are kept oiled by these advertisements. And whether you happen to want to buy anything or not, you will miss one of the chief educational opportunities given to you by your magazine if you fail to study the weekly or monthly output of the advertising men of America, the most expert users of the English language in the world.

TO accommodate the thousands of representatives of this profession who assembled in Philadelphia, the University of Pennsylvania opened its score of buildings with their auditoriums. But they were not sufficient for the purpose. The sessions and conferences overflowed into other buildings, and the great exhibition floor of the Commercial Museum of Philadelphia was placed at their disposal. The convention was begun on Sunday with addresses by advertising men in the pulpits of at least fifteen of the city's leading churches. In the afternoon of that Sunday, a great inspirational mass meeting was held in the Metropolitan Opera House and addressed by the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Franklin K. Lane, and the president of the Advertising Clubs, Herbert S. Houston. On each of the following five days there were general sessions and conferences to the number of a score or more, at which the brightest minds in the business world discussed all phases of the great problem of getting you and me educated in the art of living well.

The emblem of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World is a map of the world across the face of which is printed the one word "Truth." The outstanding note in all the discussions was the insistence upon truth in advertising. "No man's permanent good will or friendship was ever bought," declared one speaker. "It has got to be won." "If it were possible for the truth movement (in advertising) to close its books and submit a report in figures to this convention," asserted another, "it would show a net gain for the year that would be startling." One of the most active committees of the organization is the Vigilance Committee, which ferrets out dishonest advertisers and where possible brings legal action to bear. The report of this committee disclosed an astonishing number of individuals and firms intent on fleecing the public through dishonest advertising, and the whole power of the Associated Advertising Clubs is directed to their elimination. For self-protection and the protection of the public, reputable magazines and newspapers cooperate with this Vigilance Committee by rigid censorship of all advertising matter submitted.

From the viewpoints of country-store merchant to department store, and from the small factory to the biggest plant in the country, the ethics of advertising were discussed at these departmental conferences. Most of the subjects would sound technical to the layman. But the earnestness and enthusiasm with which the topics were discussed would convince any layman that the men of the advertising profession fully realize that upon their wise and honorable use of advertising space depend in very large measure the health, wealth and happiness of the great American public.

THE formal and determined entrance of the churches into the advertising field was a signal event of the Convention. The three sessions on Church Advertising and Publicity, attended by about 300 clergymen and advertising men, threw light upon this subject from every possible angle. Remarkable to say, there was not one dissenting voice to the proposition that churches should advertise. "Advertising will definitely cause church growth if the church deserves to grow," was the testimony. It was the concensus of opinion that every form of advertising which is legitimate for an honorable business is proper for a church to employ, but governed by local conditions. Cooperative advertising by all the denominations in national periodicals, supplemented

The Passing of the World's Greatest Mining Camp

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I WRITE of Dawson, the capital of Northwestern Canada, the metropolis of the Klondike mining region, and for years the richest mining camp of the world. It is just about two decades since gold was discovered on Bonanza Creek, and now $180,000,000 worth of that metal has been thawed out of the frozen earth within a few miles of where I am writing. The first discovery was in 1896, and the camp reached the height of its prosperity about five years later. Its gold output that year was over $22,000,000, and it has annually produced millions from that time until now. The product last year was about $5,000,000, and they will be getting out that much for some years to come.

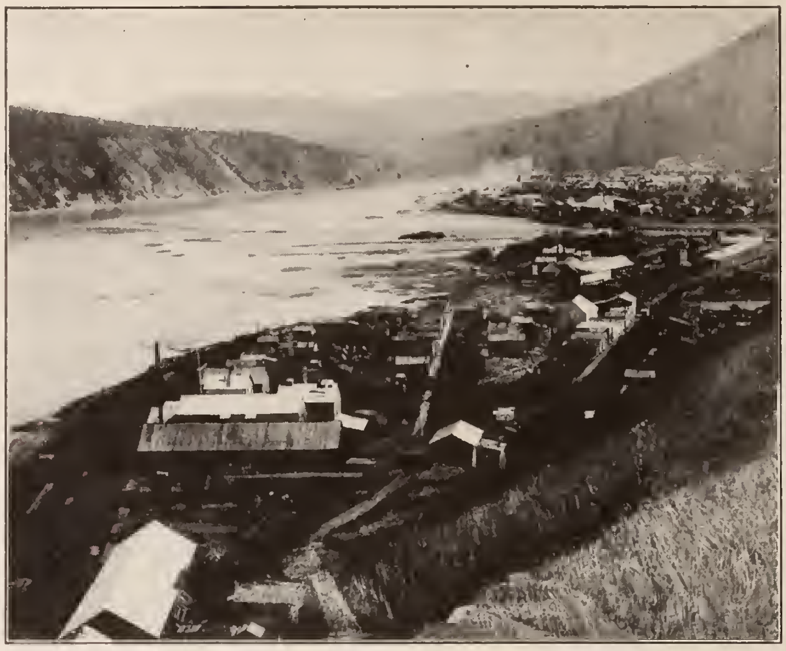
The first mining was done by individuals. Stray miners, prospectors and fortune hunters rushed in from all parts of the world. Each had his own pick and shovel, his gold pan and his fire-brand. He dug down into the icy gravel and thawed it away as he looked for the rich pockets of gold. Within seven or eight years the cream of the camp was skimmed off and the small miners left. Then came great companies with millions of capital and the finest of mining machinery. They have been working the low-grade ground of the valleys and have been washing down the mountains to save the sprinkling of gold dust left in them. Great dredges, which cost hundreds of thousands of dollars apiece, now do the labor of hundreds of men, and rivers of water, carried for miles in pipes over the country, are dashed against the hills to get out the gold. The age of machinery has replaced the age of muscle and men and Dawson suffers in consequence.

The Dawson of the past had at times more than 30,000 citizens, and in the region about were more than 60,000 inhabitants. Today the city has less than 3,000, and the outlying districts one-third as much more. It is only a question of a few years when the precious metal will all be carried away and the chief reason for a city here will have disappeared. One of the great hopes of the people lies in the discovery of rich quartz mines or the mother lode from which all this loose gold has come. With this view the hills have been prospected in every direction, but so far no such find has been made.

The location of the city is just where it started when gold was discovered. The houses still cover the mouth of the valley of the Klondike River and the east bank of the Yukon north of where that river runs in. They climb the sides of the hills and run far up the Klondike to where the mountains of gravel upflung by the dredges begin. The town is laid out like a checkerboard, with its streets crossing one another at right angles. The streets are wide; they have roadways of solid earth and sidewalks of boards. The roads are smooth, and the traffic includes automobiles and heavy draft wagons. There are more than fifty automobiles in use and 250 miles of good country road has been made by the government in the valleys near by.

The town looks shabby when you first enter it. It has been burned down several times since the great rush. There are vacant lots here and there, covered with the charred remains of the buildings. Most of the stores are of one story, and log cabins of all sizes are interspersed with frame houses as comfortable as those in the larger towns in the States. Scores of the homes have little gardens about them, and not a few have hothouses, in which vegetables and flowers are raised under glass.

Dawson has some pretentious buildings. The administration offices of the Yukon territory are in a frame structure of three or four stories, surrounded by a lawn as smooth and as well kept as that of the White House at Washington. Another large building is the public high school, and a third is that which contains the post office and custom house.



Dawson at the confluence of the Klondike (flowing in from the right) and the Yukon

THE Dawson of today has none of the life of the Dawson of the past. It is now a Sunday school town with a dozen churches, a city library, women's clubs, sewing societies and afternoon teas. There are still some saloons, but the songs of the dance halls have been driven out by the hymns of salvation. Dawson is the capital of the Canadian territory of the Yukon, which is one-third as large as Alaska, and it is the residence of the commissioner or governor, and the headquarters of the courts and the mounted police. The stores have large stocks of goods; they have most of the trade of the Yukon and some from eastern Alaska. Every one seems well to do. Wages are high and the cheapest labor is paid as much as $5 or $6 a day. The cost of living is above that of the States. I pay 25 cents for a newspaper, 25 cents for a shine and a like amount for every least thing under the sun. In fact, the smallest coin used is a quarter, and this has been so ever since coins came into the country. I dropped into a provision store and asked the grocer his prices. He had some watermelons of about half the size of those sold in the States, and sells them at $1.50 each. His cantaloupes bring 75 cents apiece and his apples a dollar a dozen. Ranch eggs are worth $1 a dozen, and eggs from the outside 75 cents. Chickens are quoted at $3 apiece, or $36 a dozen.

Bread is now selling at the rate of two loaves for a quarter, and butter, made in the country, costs $1 a pound. Milk brings $1.50 a gallon and cream is $2 a quart. These are prices in summer. In the heart of midwinter, when the hens go on a strike, eggs go to $5 a dozen. In early days they sometimes sold for $18 a dozen, and were c

Light on the Sabbath from Babylonia

By PROFESSOR ALBERT T. CLAY, Babylonian Department, Yale University

THE Sabbath has not only been regarded by certain scholars as of Babylonian origin, but they have declared that the institution itself originated in the Tigro-Euphrates Valley. This is regarded as one of the important results obtained through archeological research. Following are the facts upon which their conclusions rest: The expression, "Sha-bat-tum-um nukh libbi" has been known for some time. This was translated, "Shabattum is the day of the rest of the heart." Subsequently it was shown to mean "the day of the appeasement of the heart of the gods."

There has been known for some time also what has been called the "Hemerology" for the months Second Elul and Marchesvan, in which, on the seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first, twenty-eighth, as well as the nineteenth day, certain duties were prescribed for the king, diviner, physician, and imprecator. It was found in the library of Ashurbanipal. Being translated, the regulation for these days reads: "An evil day. The shepherd of great peoples shall not eat flesh cooked over coals of an oven; he shall not change the garment of his body; he shall not put on clean [clothes]; a sacrifice he shall not offer; the king shall not ride in his chariot; he shall not speak as a king; the diviner shall not give a decision in the secret place; the physician shall not lay his hand upon the sick; it is not suitable to pronounce a curse. At night, the king shall bring his gift before Marduk and Ishtar; he shall offer a sacrifice. The lifting up of his hands is pleasing to the god."

Subsequently, Dr. T. G. Pinches, of London, discovered that shabattum, which was a synonym of gamaru (to be full), was the name of the fifteenth day of the month when the moon was full, showing that it was quite distinct from the days mentioned in the Hemerology. This gave rise at once to the idea that originally the Sabbath was the day of the full moon. Still more recently indications have been noted that the Hebrew Sabbath originally was the same, though it came later to be celebrated at the end of the week, or in the succession of seven days.

THE literature that has grown up since these discoveries is quite extensive; and the view is generally held that the Sabbath was originally a full moon festival; that, as with the Hindus in India, there were festivals of the new moon and the full moon; and that the day is to be definitely distinguished from the Sabbath of the post-exilic period. With this question, which becomes quite complicated, we are not directly concerned here. Rather we are interested as to whether the Babylonians observed such a day; and if so, whether it is a Babylonian or a West Semitic institution.

The fact that there is no root in the Assyrian from which shabattum, as a synonym of the root gamaru, "to complete, to fulfil, to bring to an end, to destroy," can be derived, and that there is in the western and southern groups of the Semitic languages a root from which the word "Sabbath" is derived, namely, "to cut off, to desist, to put an end to, to destroy," seems a very substantial argument for maintaining that the name of the fifteenth day of the month was of West Semitic origin. Not only is the word "Sabbath" not Babylonian, but what the day stood for—at least in late Biblical times, and, as well as at the present, namely, the idea of a day of rest for man and beast—finds no support in the Babylonian inscriptions. There is nothing besides the Hemerology to show that anything of the sort existed in Babylonia.

If one examines the dating of the thousands of contract tablets which have been published, nothing is in evidence to show that there was any abstention from business transactions, with perhaps a single exception, namely, the nineteenth day, which in certain periods may have been partially observed as a kind of holy day. More than this, nothing is known at present as regards a "rest day." These facts certainly do not seem to support the contention that we are dependent upon the Babylonians for our idea of the Sabbath rest.

Some recent investigations seem, however, to point to certain observances of the post-exilic age in Babylonia, which in a measure parallel certain Hebrew ideas of the Sabbath. Moreover, these discoveries, it will be observed, raise the question whether the Hebrews observed the Sabbath as a lunar festival or at the end of the week.

In a large archive of temple documents in the Yale Collection, discovered at Warka, the ancient city of Erech, there is found a group of twenty-three tablets, containing monthly receipts of sheep, which are apparently intended for the temple service. Nearly all the tablets are baked and are more or less perfect. They are dated between the fifth year of Cyrus (534 B.C.) and the sixth year of Cambyses (523 B.C.), inclusive. The general character of the contents is similar. The tablets are records of what was delivered for sacrificial purposes each day of the month. The important feature of these lists in this connection is the item following certain days of the month, usually the seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first and twenty-eighth, which reads: "1 urisu sikhru khi-it-pi," "one young kid, an offering," or simply "1 khi-it-pi," "one offering." The largest number of these notes, "one kid [for] an offering," namely, forty-nine, occur on the days: seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-eighth; while, with the exception of but one, the remainder, namely, twenty-eighth, occurs one day earlier. The single exception occurs two days earlier, upon the twenty-sixth of the month. In no instance does it follow this periodical seventh day. There can be little doubt that the regular appointed time for this offering was on the seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first and twenty-eighth days; but it was occasionally made upon the previous day. The Sabbath among the Hebrews at the present time begins shortly after sunset on the sixth day. It might be added that the number of days in the month does not seem to have had any bearing upon these variations. These tablets, with this interesting phenomenon, furnish the first actual observance of anything that suggests the existence of a parallel to the Sabbath in Babylonia.

IT has been pointed out that the Hemerology contains interesting parallels to the restrictions for the Sabbath day which are known from the Old Testament. Of especial interest is this tablet, as well as the new find, in the light of the directions given by Ezekiel (46 : 4) to be observed by the prince in behalf of the nation; namely, that on the Sabbath he shall offer unto the Lord six lambs and a ram. It cannot be said that the tablets under consideration refer to provision being made for the animal that was to be offered by the king, which is mentioned in the Hemerology on these days; but they do show that one was actually provided on these days, in addition to the regular offerings for each day of the month. The somberness and austerity of these days in the Hemerology, at least as regards the provisions for the individuals referred to, can also be paralleled by the ideas pertaining to the Hebrew Sabbath. While it was preeminently a day of rest, and was also regarded as a day of joy, there are indications that it was an austere occasion, especially in the early history of the people. It was not only a day when sacrifices were offered, but also a day when the people were forbidden to leave their homes (Ex. 16 : 29); to kindle fires (Ex. 35 : 3); and, therefore, not to eat anything cooked over fire (Ex. 16 : 23). While the critical position is that in the late days of Jewry these restrictions were introduced into the history of t period, that is simply a hypoth cannot be proved. Rather seem that these ideas are a sur an early period.

As is known, there were thos

I'm going to be well informed and up to date—even if I am old!" she said.

"But suppose," questioned a girl who had been listening quietly to the conversation, "suppose you had a family. And suppose your family thought that you were old—too old to enjoy life. Suppose your family wouldn't believe that you were young enough and clever enough to do as you wanted to and go where you wanted to, and read what you wanted to. I've known families like that!"

I have known families like that, too. And it isn't always grandmothers that they kindly but firmly push to one side. Sometimes a father or a mother is apt to be laid on the shelf. Sometimes it is an aunt or a grandfather who is sweetly ignored. Because some one thinks they are too old—or not young enough—to be interested or to care.

I have known a great many grandmothers—some of them have been the grandmothers of my girl chums; some of them have been mere acquaintances. And many of these grandmothers have confided to me—

"Yes, I know I am old—but I'm not as old as they think. I'm young enough to want to get out and see things; I'm young enough to be interested in the young folks; I'm young enough to want to have my hand to things. I still want to make cookies, and help cut out dresses. I still want to go calling. But they think I'm too old and feeble to be human."

Louisa K. Theirs is thirty-two years over the allotted threescore and ten. But she is young enough to give a lesson to many middle-aged women and many girls who are in their teens. For she says, "Make yourself useful to your fellow men—"

That is, after all, the solution. If one wants to grow old gracefully, one must make herself useful to her fellow men. For any one who is able to be useful to her fellow men will never grow too old to be interested in them.

GIRLS, and older girls, it's foolish to think that growing old is an unpleasant business. Some of the most gracious, queenly women that I have ever known have been the oldest. Some of the most charming ladies who have ever entertained me have been of the same age as the little lady who is tucked in a corner to knit. Some of my best-informed friends have been over seventy.

Grow old gracefully. Don't give up your ideals and interests because your hair is turning gray. Don't let people put you on a shelf; make them need and want you by the charm and personality and force of your character. And now, girls, never say that your mothers and grandmothers are too old to understand. Instead of saying that, give them a chance to understand; give them a chance to grow old gracefully.

To Save the Porcelain

If your porcelain insulator breaks, your spark plug is out of business.

There's nothing for it but a new insulator or a new plug.

The rapid succession of explosions in your cylinders beat with full force on the shoulders of the insulators of your spark plugs.

Champion plugs are made with two asbestos-cushioned copper gaskets (patented by us April 25, 1916) to protect the porcelain and prevent loss of compression.

That is one big, exclusive feature which accounts for the greater dependability of Champion Spark Plugs.

And their greater dependability accounts for the fact that more plugs of this type are in use today than any other plug ever designed.

And this same condition has existed for years.

Champion Dependability and the reasons for it should be remembered when you replace the plugs in your motor.

There is a Champion Plug designed especially to serve the particular kind of motor you have in your car.

Your dealer knows which Champion you need.

Be sure the name "Champion" is on the porcelain—not merely on the box.

The Christian Herald Prayer Leagu

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League. All correspondents are specially requested to make their letters as brief as possible. Write requests and acknowledgments on separate sheets.

MRS. E. C. writes from Ohio: "I cannot tell you how much I thank you for your prayers that my dear brother might be cured of the drink habit. He is still going to church, and has started Sunday school. I met, with her little daughter, a lady whose husband is addicted to the drink habit. It is taking all their money and they are trying to pay for a little home. Will you please pray that this man may be cured, and also a neighbor who has the same habit?"

C. B. W., Missouri, writes: "Thanks to God for answering prayers, some for temperance victory, some for spiritual strength, others for opening up ways for employment for loved ones, also for friends being strengthened against trials and temptations."

H. C. writes: "The daughter-in-law for whom I asked prayer that she might be released from the liquor habit has resolved to touch liquor no more. Thus far she has held out in the resolution."

Mrs. A. P. writes from Jamestown, N. Y.: "Some time ago I asked prayers for my husband, who suffered from the drink habit. Please pray that he may be released, as he has fallen again after five and one-half months of abstinence."

Mrs. H. W. G. writes from Marlboro, N. Y.: "I am a believer in prayer. I have been praying that my mother, who has been in very poor health, might be restored to better health, if it is God's will. I received word that she is greatly improving and gaining all the time."

A Mother writes from Shelby, Ohio: "Some months ago I asked your prayers for my son, who was financially ruined. I feel as though those prayers were miraculously answered. But do not stop praying for him, for the trials are great. Pray that we all may endure them."

S. G. N. writes from Williamsburg, Va.: "I wish to return thanks to our heavenly Father and to the League. Our prayers have been answered and my nephew's deafness has been healed."

How Kansas City's Prayer Was Answered

MORE than a year ago, the Ministers' Alliance of Greater Kansas City sent an urgent invitation to evangelist Billy Sunday to come there for a campaign. The answer gave no hope. Then the Kansas City Star petitioned the evengelist, promising unstinted support if he would come. Later a handful of men assembled in the "upper room" for prayer and conference at Independence. From this "upper room" plans were started for a delegation to go to Omaha to interview Mr. Sunday. Who would go? It was not known until near the time for the special train to leave. Ex-Mayor Henry M. Beardsley was appealed to several days previous to the departure of the delegation. He said, "I cannot possibly go. My work here is urgent and I cannot think of going." A company of men covenanted together to pray that Mr. Beardsley might find a way to go. Just before the train left he joined the delegation. Mr. R. A. Long, the millionaire disciple, was asked by a group of men to be one of the delegation. He replied, "I would be pleased to go, but cannot because of the pressure of business." The same company of men in the "upper room" prayed that Mr. Long might find a way to go to Omaha with them. Mr. Long joined the delegation at the train.

On the Russian front it has been give-and-take all the week. In the north, there are signs that the Russians are about to take the offensive against von Hindenburg's army, but this has not yet developed, though large skirmishes were frequent during the week. In the center, to the east of Baranavitchi, there was a three-day battle during the week, the first phase of which was won by the Russians, who broke into the German positions. Later on, the Germans brought up reinforcements, and the Russians were driven back. In these operations both sides report the taking of prisoners. Severe Russian pressure still continues at this point.

All along the line south desultory fighting took place until the Kolki position was reached. At and west of Kolki and Sokul the fighting became more continuous and severe, hard-fought battles taking place almost daily. One day the Russians won and the next the Teutons, the outcome being that the Germans abandoned the Czartorysk salient north of Kolki and fell back to a new line of defense. Farther south, directly west of Lutsk and to the east of Kosin and Saturzy, the Germans seem to have slightly improved their positions, but only slightly. On the southern Styr, north and east of Berestetschko, south of Lutsk and southeast of Dubno, the same thing is true.

In Galicia, along the line of the Strypa river, the Austro-Germans gained ground to the east, northwest of Tarnopol, and held their own on the rest of the line, while still farther south, north of the Dniester and southeast of Buczacz at Tlumacz, the Russians were forced back five miles on a front of twelve miles, losing heavily both in casualties and prisoners.

In southeastern Galicia and in Bukowina, however, the tide ran decidedly in favor of the Russians. In Southern Bukowina, Cossack cavalry not only reached but crossed the Carpathian passes, and arrived at the most northerly of the Hungarian villages on the southern slopes of the range.

In southeastern Galicia, the important railroad center of Kolomea fell into the hands of the Russians, who thus came into full control of the Pruth River from the Rumanian border to that town. Later on in the week the Russians advanced southeast from Kolomea, and, after taking Stoboda, reached the railroad from Korosmezo to Delatyn at Mikuliczyn, thus cutting off communication by this line between Hungary and Galicia.

In the Caucasus, on the Russian right wing and center, the Turks have made but little progress during the week, but on the left wing they have compelled the Russian troops, which were attempting to advance southward from positions on the frontier of western Persia, on Bagdad, to fall back a distance of about sixty miles, and in their advance have reached and occupied the city of Kermanshah, which the Russians took some months ago and whose loss they now admit. This for a time at least, puts an end to any Russian advance on Bagdad.

In Mesopotamia the situation remains the same. The Turk and the Briton occupy the same positions as hitherto on the Tigris, twenty miles below Kut-el-Amara.

the first $500,000 being paid last February. The railroad will be completed this year as far as Matanuska. The present line is said to have cost the men who built it $2,750,000. The completion of the line will open up the richest coal fields in Alaska.

REBELS MAKE PEACE. On Saturday, July 1, an engagement occurred in Santo Domingo between rebels entrenched at Guayacanes and American marines. Twenty-seven Dominicans were killed and five captured, one marine was killed and eight wounded. Following this action, negotiations which were already under way were consummated and the rebel leaders agreed to lay down their arms. The present revolutionary disturbance on the island has lasted two months, has occupied 2,000 American marines and has cost three American lives.

BANKER DIES IN NEW YORK. James G. Cannon, formerly President of the Fourth National Bank and one of three or four prominent Christian citizens who furnished the financial support for the Men and Religion Forward Movement in 1912, died at his home in Golden's Bridge, N. Y., on July 5. He began his business career as a messenger in the bank of which he was later president.

SELLS COMPETING LINE. It was announced on July 6 that the New York Central Railroad Company had sold for $8,500,000 its majority holdings in the New York, Chicago and St. Louis Railroad commonly known as the "Nickel Plate." The control of the Nickel Plate has been held by the Lake Shore since 1883. It is suggested that the new owners of the Nickel Plate may electrify a part of the line for suburban service in connection with real estate developments.

by individual church advertising in the local press, is a possibility within sight. The best informed men at the conferences agreed that the church could no more expect the general public to use its products without being informed about them through advertising than any other agency for improving conditions of living could expect the public to clamor for its goods if they were not advertised. The history of every prosperous business shows an unbroken policy of advertising. This secret of success, the conference believed, should now be made wise use of by every church that would serve its community aright.

As a consequence, a Commission on Church Advertising and Publicity was formed as reported in last week's Christian Herald. This commission is composed of capable leaders in this new field of activity. In due course announcements will be made of the plans for the year. The first object is to acquaint all churches in this country with the best ways and means of advertising what they have to offer to their communities. The purpose is to put at the service of the church for the cause of Christ the greatest force that the business world employs for profit. At the start this has very much the character of Christian philanthropy, but those who are guiding the movement expect to make the commission self-supporting through the collection of membership dues and in other ways appropriate to their work. It is, of course, without financial resources at the start, and Christian men of means could scarcely find a more useful way to serve the church of Christ than to make some contribution to the establishment of the Commission on Church Advertising and Publicity. Rev. Christian F. Reisner, pastor of the Grace Methodist Episcopal Church of New York City, is president of the Commission and for the present acting treasurer. He can be addressed on this subject in care of the Christian Herald during the summer.

THE city of Philadelphia put on holiday dress to welcome the advertising men and members of their families, and provided extraordinary entertainment during the week of the Convention. The extent and character of the hospitality shown is but one reflection of the respect in which the profession is held by the country at large. The Twelfth Annual Convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World has emphasized anew the indispensable service which is rendered the public through the advertising columns of all classes of reputable journals. These interesting portions of our newspapers and magazines, prepared with as much care as the most important literary contribution, constitute an actual school of culture in which as individuals and as a people we are learning how to keep well, to dress well, and to live well, in order that we may do well.

Smile Makers

At Rising Time

Do you know any food which greets you at breakfast so inviting as Puffed Wheat or Rice?

Airy bubbles of grain, flaky, toasted and crisp. Each morsel seems a bonbon.

But you know they are whole grains, made wholly digestible. You know that every atom feeds.

No elements are lacking—none are lost. For in these foods—and these only—every food cell is blasted by steam explosion.

At Dinner Time

These grains are so crisp, so toasted, so flavory that they take the place of nutmeats.

Folks garnish ice cream with them. They use them in candy. They dot them on frosted cake.

Yet Puffed Grains hold supreme place among scientific grain foods. They are made by Prof. Anderson's process. In every kernel a hundred million steam explosions are created. They are perfect foods—the best-cooked cereals in existence.

You get the whole wheat in Puffed Wheat—all the phosphorus of the outer coats. You get it so it easily, completely digests without any tax to the stomach.

Do you know anything else which so meets the requirements of an ideal good-night dish?

"JUST DAVID"

By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna"

Just David
By Eleanor H. Porter
Author of Pollyanna - Miss Billy - The Story of Marco - The Turn of the Tide - Cross Currents - etc.

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend. "Just David," bound in cloth, with frontispiece, postpaid, $1.25 net.

We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new eight-months' subscription accompanied by $1.00. Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year and send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, for $2.00.

"AMARILLY"

In Book Form

We have had so many inquiries for "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley" in book form that it gives us much pleasure to announce the sale of a special edition of this splendid story. No one can forget the charm of Amarilly. Amarilly was a child of the slums, the oldest of a family of eight, all wage-earners, except the baby. How prosperity in the end came to the Jenkins Family, how Amarilly got an education, how the Boarder married Lily Rose and built an annex and the adventures of the surplice are told in a wholesome story. In the human appeal, sweet humor, and genuine cheeriness between its covers, there will await you many laughs; and a tear or two as well.

We will send "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley," attractively bound in cloth, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, for $2.00. Or, we will send "Amarilly" to old subscribers as a reward for sending us one new eight-months' subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.00.

The Word of the Cross

International Sunday School Lesson for July 30
I Cor. 1 : 1 to 2 : 5

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"Far be it from me to glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." Gal. 6 : 14

The cross, when Paul wrote, was the badge of shame and disgrace. Only the lowest criminals were subjected to its torture. To be even the relative of a crucified person would set a gaping void between any such and the gay and thoughtless crowd that went laughing and singing on its way. But that was the very reason why Paul so gloried in the cross. It settled once and for all the question of his own relationship with the vain and empty world. It set him outside its pale. It passed him by with sneers and ridicule. It had no desire or use for him. To recognize the friend of the Nazarene, the boaster in the cross, was unthinkable. He was offscouring and refuse of all things. I was quite glad of this. He gladly acce the verdict. Had it not been so cle fixed, he might have been tempted by gauds or frightened by the frown Madam Bubble. Now he was absolu indifferent. "Take thy way, O tempt world; I want nought of thee. T holdest me a felon for consorting with Crucified; I hold thee a felon since t didst put him to death. The cross sta between us. Thou canst not come to I have no desire to come to thee. The Lo cross has made friendship impossible."

The Knowledge of Christ

By Arthur H. Howland

I AM writing this lesson at Washington, on the day that the war horror begins to be lifted from the American nation. The capital is beautiful on this fair, warm, fragrant day; the air full of hope and peace.

Thinking of the men who have presided over the nation's destinies here, and remembering the somewhat vicious, or at least unfortunate, expression, "Every American boy expects to be President," and trying to enumerate the things that would prevent me from attaining the fulfilment of that universal ambition, I thought first of all: "I don't know enough to be President."

Then there flashed back to my mind the key to this wonderful letter the apostle Paul wrote to the church at Corinth, where he had labored through so many hard but victorious months. "I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." And I thought again how if the principles of Jesus, the crucified Saviour, were really applied to national and international affairs, the world's problems would be untangled, the world's wrongs righted, the world's hurts healed.

I had left New York without warning and with no chance to pack a grip, and had no Bible with me; so I began to look about the Washington streets for at least a copy of the New Testament. I inquired at one or two places, then realized how hopeless the quest would be. Alas, there is little popular demand for Bibles at the Nation's capital, or in any city, large or small. The Bible is, to be sure, the world's "best seller." But it is a rather special trade, to a special class—and largely in wholesale supplies for free distribution. But the people, the real people that make America, and that make Europe, and that make the world, do not realize their need of the New Testament, do not realize the need for that knowledge of which Paul speaks, which would make all men glad, and good, and truly prosperous.

I hunted up the church of an old friend in the city, and though he was not in, I borrowed a Bible of the caretaker and came back to my hotel to write this letter about Paul's letter to the Corinthians. He is supposed to have written it from Philippi. Scholars wonder if the Sosthenes whose name he joins to that of his own in the salutation was the same Sosthenes who became chief official of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth after Crispus had become converted, that Sosthenes who was beaten by the Greeks in the presence of the careless Gallio. It may be the same man; if so, there is a beautiful story to think about—the second synagogue head of Corinth to come under the charm of Paul's Gospel and yield himself to it.

Paul greets the Corinthian Christians as he greeted those of Thessalonica—with "grace" and "peace." That is a good atmosphere to create at the beginning of a letter—a sense of God's abiding cheerful goodness an abiding peace.

Again Paul praises his reade their fidelity. He knew that in things many of them had not faithful. Indeed, they had been h unfaithful. But some had been fa perhaps a few had been faithful things. He could doubtless hav that of Aquila and Priscilla if the remained there, but they had mo Ephesus. But he praised the Cori Christians for what they had, a what they had done, before going rebuke them for their shortco Compare with this the greeting through the pen of St. John t church at Sardis: "Thou hast names even in Sardis which hav defiled their garments; and they walk with me in white, for the worthy."

Paul's hope was to build up a c not having spot, nor wrinkle, no such thing—to develop individual tians who would be saints indeed. is the real message of almost a letters—a call to holiness. So he the Corinthian church, with all its and failings, as a group of God' children, precious in his sigh praises them when they can be pr points out their faults, gives them a about their organization and e and then cries: "Yet show I unt a more excellent way" (chap. 12 Whereupon he describes the pur power of Christian love, that shall them what they ought to be. Ne close of his second letter he sun his hopes for them: "This also we even your perfection" (II Cor. 1 It is the same as his hope expresse at the beginning of the first le "that ye may be blameless in the our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor.

He mentions his first accusati 1:11: "There are contentions a you." Differences among Chr people have been among the baffling, inscrutable mysteries o ages. Why should Christians disag Christians who love one another who love a common Saviour? But do—and they did in the time of Some said: "I am of Paul." said: "I, of Apollos," some: " Cephas," that is Peter; some " Christ."

We have already referred in lessons to the sharp differences seem to have existed between early Christians who followed leadership and those who foll Peter and James. Now he spea some who follow Apollos, and of who disclaim any teacher at all e Christ himself.

Paul pleads with them all to be u in the deep simplicities of the lov knowledge of Christ. Those who of the name of Christ must sho spirit. They must be not prou humble in the possession of hea wisdom.

Then follows Paul's wonderful osophizing about the transce quality of this heavenly wisdom, on the cross of Jesus. It is a thin Greeks, with all their learning, c understand; it is a thing at whic ew stumble—yet it is "the power f Cd."

Hv many people would enjoy music bre enjoying it they had to underar its laws? Why are certain tones leang, others distressing? Why are ertn combinations of tones pleasing, nd hence called harmonious, while th are unpleasant and discordant? Ve not have to know the answer to hes questions to get the delight and he essing of music. Why are certain om nations of form and color charming nd others unattractive or repellent? Ve not have to understand that to et e beauty of the sunset. We do not eed to know anything about the ie e of odors to revel in the intoxiati sweetness of lilac or violet.

Jt so we do not need to understand he ntricacies of theology or the ysries of the atonement to get the les ng and the glory of Christ upon our ve. The wisdom that is not from above "rthly, sensual"—sometimes even delish" (James 3:15). But the wisdom on above is "first pure, then peaceblegentle, and easy to be entreated. ll mercy and good fruits, without arlity and without hypocrisy" ver 17).

S here is the real reason why Christian disagree. They do not get near no h to God. They follow their own isom, or the wisdom of some earthly eacer, instead of his. The place for hrians to agree is upon their knees a pyer, receiving the pure, peaceable, en wisdom of God. Some organizaion hat have had rare success in God's or make it a rule never to venture ut ith new plans till all have agreed po the matter in prayer together. hrigh this sort of unity and faith the isom of God becomes in groups of is llowers the power of God.

Jus is everything to the believing ou He is "made unto us wisdom, nd ighteousness, and sanctification, nd edemption" (verse 30). He comes losto us with his heavenly friendship, eving to us the will of God, showing s w to transmute our love for him atc ighteous living, fanning that love ll purifies our souls, guaranteeing o ep us day by day till our final edeption is secure.

N wonder, then, that Paul had etenined, when he first came to orth in the companionship of such a hrt, "not to know anything," while e orked in that wicked city, "save est Christ, and him crucified."

Consider again what that means—not to know anything nor any one but Christ. It means that loyalty to him must come before all other loyalties, that we must be true to him and to what he stands for regardless of all other considerations, that we must meet every problem and every crisis with the question: "What would Jesus do?" We know where he stood—for love, for kindness, for service, for self-sacrifice; and we must accept these standards for our own, at whatever cost.

But our knowledge of the crucified Saviour means more than this. It means not only that we must accept that law of sacrifice and crucifixion for our own life; it means that we accept that sacrifice of his as the thing that mysteriously saves us. We come here to deep places that the human mind cannot fathom. But voices of many ages past, and voices all over the world today, and voices in heaven—voices that no man can number—unite in saying and singing rapturously: "He died for me."

His death brings us near to God. His death changes and cleanses our souls. His death takes away the anguish of old sin, robs present temptation of its power, and gives us sure hope for the eternal future. So we may well disdain all other knowledge that would exclude this. We may well make this the basis and the test of all we know and do. We may well boast with Paul, "I determined not to know anything save Jesus Christ, and him crucified."

Working Toward Union in India

THE missionary churches of India are planning a federation which will unite them for progressive work and lay the foundations of an Indian Church that will know no divisions. The plan of federation has been approved by the Presbyterian Church, the M. E. Church the South India United Church, the Baptist Missionary Society, the American Marathi Mission, and the Friends Mission. It is felt that "a basis has now been reached that means a real and vital union, one that will express to the world the essential substance of the Christian faith, and the reality of the spiritual union that surmounts the diversity in statement of belief, modes of worship, of polity and of administration in the different branches of the Christian Church, and that will enable the different churches to join forces in fullest cooperation in doing the work entrusted to them by their Master." It is proposed to leave each church to worship and work in its own way, ready to cooperate to the fullest extent with other churches, recognizing them as belonging to Christ, as part of his body.

THE Utah Gospel Mission of Cleveland, Ohio, has been doing a traveling missionary work for fifteen years. Its workers have visited nearly every Mormon home three or four times; they held 2,700 meetings with over 200,000 present and have used over seventeen million pages of printed matter. Their work has covered a field about 250 x 800 miles, and they have traveled a distance equal to more than twice around the earth. The mission needs two or three new workers, capable, consecrated men, of any evangelical denomination. Details may be had by addressing the mission at 1854 East Eighty-first Street, Cleveland, Ohio.

MISSIONARY GEO. H COX of Chinkiang, writes: "You will be reading in the papers about the political situation in China at the present time. The mission work is not affected by these disturbances yet, except in the immediate vicinity of fighting, and I have only heard of one place where the mission premises were in the line of fire, and that in Szechuan province. We hope Yuan will resign and let other men have a chance of coming forward."

Sermonic Appreciation

IN my judgment, one of the best sermons that have appeared in the Christian Herald in the past twenty years (for nearly that period I have taken the paper) was in last week's issue, by Rev. Mercer G. Johnston, on "The Demand for Divine Judgment." It was logical, convincing and symmetrical, and ought to do a world of good. The doctrine was safe, sound and reliable. God bless brother Johnston! We would like to hear from him again. CLAYTON C. SHEPARD.

Cotton
Gauzes
First Aids
Fumigators
Adhesive Plaster, Etc.

Our Deadliest Enemies
Are Unseen Germs—Be Careful

It isn't the cut that you have to fear—nor any ordinary wound. It's the chance of germ infection.

What will you do?

Are you ready, in the right way, for such accidents?

You need Absorbent Cotton.

You need Bandages and Gauze.

You need Adhesive Plaster.

But the Cotton and Gauze must be utterly sterile. Else you might as well use any chance piece of cloth.

The way to be sure—to be double-sure—is to use only B&B dressings.

B&B Cotton and Gauze are twice sterilized—once after being sealed.

B&B "Arro" Cotton and Handy-Fold Gauze are put up in germ-proof envelopes—many in a package—to keep safe until you use them.

B&B Cotton also comes in a Handy Package. You cut off only what you use. The rest remains untouched.

B&B Adhesive

B&B Zinc-Oxide Adhesive sticks without wetting. It stays fresh.

It sticks to anything dry, and stays stuck. So it has a thousand uses. You can mend anything with it from lawn hose to golf clubs. It clings to metal, rubber, wood, glass or cloth.

B&B Fumigators

B&B Formaldehyde Fumigators are given twice the usual strength. And safety needs it.

You can get these Double-Sure products by insisting on B&B. When we take so much pains to protect you, don't you think it worth while?

Always call the doctor—remember First Aid is only first aid.

Young People's Topics for July 30

The Foreign Volunteer or a Home "Standby"?

Epworth League. Luke 8 : 38, 39; John 4 : 43-45; Matt. 24 : 12.

OUR whole topic reads: "Is it easier to be a foreign volunteer than a home 'standby'?"

This lesson is written while a good deal is being said about volunteering. At least, much has been said about it during the last days and weeks, but at this moment the war talk is happily subsiding.

It is unfortunate that so much Christian talk has the war phraseology. But it is a psychological fact that Christian experience and service mean conflict, so these war terms have crept into the Christian vocabulary.

In going away for service of any kind there is excitement, the .ang of adventure. Home work is monotonous; every-day work is drudgery. A task that means new scenes is attractive.

This helps the missionary as he goes away—though very soon, as with the soldier, too, his task becomes commonplace, and often full of drudgery. But the stay-at-home soldier or Christian worker, son or daughter, clerk or teacher or farmer—he or she has the steady, heavy burden of monotony and drudgery to bear.

Can that monotony be relieved? How?

The man told of in our Scripture lesson wanted to go away with Jesus. He had had a great new experience, found a great friendship, and wanted to stay with this wonderful Man. Jesus said: "No. Return to thy house, and declare how great things God hath done for thee."

And we may be sure he felt conscious of the new presence of Christ back there in the old town.

Find a new blessing. Let Christ touch your heart with a new gladness, wakening there a greater love for himself and for all men. Then, if he keeps you back from the big adventures and the big tasks—do the little things well for him.

How sad it will be if we shall find that while we were chafing because we could not find a bigger thing to do, someone in our own home circle, or in the circle of the daily work, has missed finding Christ because we were not faithful to these every-day opportunities and duties!

Have some one read part of Browning's poem, "The Grammarian's Funeral," and have some one sing Philip Phillips's beautiful hymn that President Lincoln praised—"Your Mission."

How Missions Are Blessing Our Nation

Christian Endeavor. Luke 19 : 41-48.

A CHRISTIAN HERALD editorial two or three weeks ago told about "Twenty-two Genuine Churches." They were churches that gave more for outside work than for the upkeep of their own establishments. Needless to say, they were churches that prospered locally as well as bearing fruit abroad.

So our nation is helped by the work we do for other nations and the gifts we make them. It has been a beautiful thing to see America contributing so generously to the suffering people of Europe during these war times. Our people are beginning to get the international spirit. They are learning that the law holds as between nation and nation as well as between man and man—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." And this new spirit of international love has been vastly helped and nurtured by the habit the American people have been forming of giving to the needs of other peoples.

Notice the reading of the passage in Isaiah which the Saviour quotes in our Scripture reference: "My house shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples." Isa. 56 : 7. That is the business of every church—to pray and work for the salvation of the world.

Christian Service on Vacation

B. Y. P. U. John 4 : 31-35 (Conquest Meeting)

THIS is a difficult subject, almost an unpleasant subject, for it is very right and necessary for Christian workers really to rest when they go on their vacations.

What we should plead for and insist upon is that we should keep the Christian spirit in vacation time—the spirit of good cheer and kindness. We cannot plan to be as genuinely helpful as in work time, for vacation, to do us good, must be somewhat lazy. But we can be on the lookout for some one to cheer, some one who may catch the lesson of love from our lives—even while we are at play.

Yet, after all, think of the millions who get no vacation. Think of the sighs, the sufferings, the sweat of those whose life is all hardness and toil. Suppose we spend some vacation time trying to plan out a way by which every toiler, particularly children and the women, may have every year a time of real rest.

D. W.—"Matt. 5 : 48.—This text was given out lately at a religious service in the following terms: 'Be ye fully developed, even as your Father which is in heaven is fully developed.' The last word is most repulsive to me in its application to God the Father. Is it correct to apply the idea of 'development' to God? If so, when did that development reach its fulness?"

IT would be unfair to criticize a preacher on the strength of a fragmentary report. One is apt to be offended by a novel phrase or idea, and ignore the accompanying explanation, thus perhaps missing a profitable lesson. The term in question is one of the rich words which abound in the New Testament, and which are difficult to render adequately into English; and I suspect that your minister was simply endeavoring, more or less successfully, to bring out its significance, and you were deterred by your initial surprise from following his argument and appropriating his message. Wherever it occurs in the New Testament, the word is rendered "perfect," except in two passages: (1) I Cor. 14 : 20: "in malice be ye children, but in understanding [R. V. "mind"] be ye men"; where the margin has "perfect" or "of a ripe age"; and (2) Heb. 5 : 14: "strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age" (A.V.), "full-grown men" (R.V.), where the margin in both versions has "perfect." Probably "perfect" is the best rendering available; but it is well to grasp, if we may, the significance of the Greek word, and the idea which it conveyed to the first readers. It denoted properly something which realizes its end, and this is perfection.

Now, it is obvious that it necessarily carries one idea when applied to God, and quite another when applied to men, inasmuch as God is eternally and unchangeably perfect, and does not attain his end, but always realizes it, whereas man is initially imperfect and attains his end by a long process of development and conflict. Hence the word was employed in two specific connections. (1) It denoted maturity of age, and this use is frequent in the New Testament. It appears in the passages already quoted and others (see I Cor. 13 : 10; Eph. 4 : 13), where it denotes full-grown men who have passed from childhood into the maturity of their physical and intellectual powers. (2) It was a technical phrase in connection with the ritual of the Greek mysteries. There "the perfect" were the initiated, who had attained the end of spiritual illumination and purification. It is a question whether this metaphor ever occurs in the New Testament, though I Cor. 2 : 6 is probably an instance of it. The idea of the word, then, as applied to men, is maturity of Christian manhood or completeness of Christian character (see Col. 1 : 28, 4 : 12); and both are attained by long and painful discipline, or rather by the gracious and patient operation of the Holy Spirit. The essential idea of the word is finality, and the notion of development is merely accidental to it. It comes in only where the end has to be attained, and it has no place in relation to God, since his perfection is absolute. He is eternally perfect, and our perfection lies in attaining his likeness. Observe what constitutes likeness to God—not Pharisaic scrupulosity or doctrinal rectitude, but generosity, compassion, and loving-kindness. And observe further that the text is not a command—"be ye perfect." The proper rendering is "ye shall be perfect" (R.V.), and this is not a promise but rather a challenge. This is our Lord's word to us: "God is your Father. Realize the inspiring obligation of so lofty a relationship, and prove worthy of it." He never commands; he never threatens. He challenges our honor, and, if we be men our hearts leap up in chivalrous response. DAVID SMITH.

Bible Picture Contest

JULY 17, 1916, was the final date for submitting sets of answers. A few sets (from the far West) are still coming in as this issue of the Christian Herald is being distributed. Of course no answers will be accepted if they bear a postmark later than that of midnight of July 17.

The sets of answers are being marked for identification and assembled for examination, with the greatest care.

Many letters of congratulation on the Contest have reached the Editor. Those letters are part of our reward. We are gratified to see our efforts appreciated. We are deeply interested to know why and how and in what respect this feature of ours has pleased each individual, and whether the Contest delighted mother, or father, or the children, the most—or may be all equally. The Christian Herald, in one sense, belongs to the Christian Herald readers; and it is their duty to speak up in approval when something meets with favor, so that the Editor may know what to continue. There is scarcely any need of repeating, what our older friends know, that your communications are always welcome!

AND it shall come to pass at that day, that I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel." Hosea 1 : 5.

Jezreel was prominent in the history of Israel from the occupation of the promised land, for the border of the tribe of Issachar was toward Jezreel. After the death of Saul, Abner, captain of the host, crowned Ishbosheth, Saul's son, king over all Israel and over Jezreel.

It was from Jezreel that the family of Jonathan fled at the tidings of the death of Saul and Jonathan in battle; and it was in this flight that Jonathan's son, Mephibosheth, he to whom David repaid the love of Jonathan, was lamed for life. When the kingdoms of Israel and Judah rose from the fragments of Solomon's domain, Jezreel became a capital of the northern kingdom. It was at Jezreel that the wicked Jezebel heard of the victory of Elijah over the prophets of Baal at Mount Carmel, and it was from Jezreel and Jezebel that Elijah fled to the desert to learn that the Lord was neither in the wind, nor in the earthquake, nor in the fire, but in the still small voice.

Naboth's vineyard was in Jezreel, the vineyard that Ahab coveted and that Jezebel so wickedly secured. In this vineyard Elijah pronounced the curse upon Ahab and Jezebel which was fulfilled as the conquering Jehu entered the city.

And now this once imperial city is a crumbling village, the home of some five hundred people; the wine presses are ruined, but the springs still flow that first drew men to the site, and the wheat still comes to golden maturity in the fields on the broad bosom of the valley.

In the first place, note the longer wheel base—112 inches.

The en bloc 35-horsepower motor which has made the Overland famous is continued.

True—it is perfected even more and now it is a fitting climax of the experience obtained from a quarter of a million of these Overland motors in daily use.

Shock absorbing cantilever type rear springs are a big improvement.

The gasoline tank placed in the rear is another improvement. The vacuum system insuring a steady even gasoline flow at all times is still another improvement.

The famous and complete Auto-Lite electric starting and lighting equipment is furnished.

All electric switches are on the steering column—right within reach.

The artistically designed streamline body with one piece cowl makes this car one of America's most attractive models.

Yet the price of this, our greatest Four cylinder value, is less than any car of its size ever sold for before.

No less a pace maker is the newest Overland Six.

Here is the Six of Sixes! A snappy five passenger long stroke 40-horsepower model—easy to handle, light, economical, mighty comfortable, having all the advantages of higher priced Sixes, yet it comes absolutely complete at a lower price than any other six of its size.

Its smart body design is long and low—having lines of artistic simplicity.

And the motor! This will warm the heart of every six-cylinder enthusiast in the country.

You've heard all about fast getaways—smoothness—crawling and climbing on high. This Six does all that and then some!

The wheel base is 116 inches. It has cantilever springs and even-flow vacuum system with the gas tank in rear.

The tires are four inch. It has the complete Auto-Lite electric starting and lighting equipment with all switches on the steering column.

Some Six! Yet the price is lower than any other six of its size.

United States "Balanced" Tires

The Chain Built Right Into the Tire

It is the chain design which gives the 'Chain' Tread its remarkably effective anti-skid and traction qualities.

Note carefully that the position and shape of the links in the two parallel chains are such as to resist slip or skid in any direction.

Note also that the height and thickness of the two chains protect the casings so well as to give them the extra mileage for which 'Chain' Treads are famous.

'Chain' Treads are the most efficient moderate-priced anti-skids in the world.

The 'Chain' is one of five United States 'Balanced' Tires which meet every motoring condition of price and use.

Questions and Answers

A. L. T., Chemawa, Ore. I have been thinking for several weeks that now is the time for the Christian Church to prove to the Jews that our Saviour is their Saviour too. I was recently told that the Jews do not read their own prophecies and therefore do not know how Jesus fulfils these prophecies. In the countries where they have been persecuted they have never known what real Christianity is. Is not now the time to show them the true faith?

You should feel that these impulses you have are divinely sent. You are perfectly right in inferring that the Christian Church has never even begun to realize its responsibility to the Jews and the power it might have in winning them to Christ. You are right also in stating that many Jews—particularly is this true of the younger generation—are ignorant of their own Scriptures. The most successful Christian Jewish workers are those who emphasize the fact that when a Jew becomes a Christian he does not by that act become any less a Jew. Christianity is the fulfilment of all the hopes of Judaism. Christianity is the best and only interpretation of the Jewish Scriptures. The writer of every book of the Bible was a Jew. The Founder of Christianity was a Jew; the arguments are unanswerable which show him to be the Jewish Messiah. All his apostles and all the original members of the first Christian communities were Jews. The church should indeed, just at this time of world upheaval, make a new, direct, vigorous campaign to reach and save the Jew.

E. N. T., Rutherford, N. J. From the reference in II Peter 3: 16, it is gathered that the Pauline epistles, and possibly other New Testament writings, had already come into use in the Christian churches. John's Gospel, which was written later, has a supplementary character that justifies the belief that he had copies of the Gospels by the other evangelists before him. Early Christian authorities, including Ignatius, Theophilus of Antioch, Tertullian and Irenæus, mention the New Testament writings in existence in their day as practically in complete form. These and other evidences lead to the conclusion that before the middle of the third century the New Testament Scriptures in a collected form were generally known among Christians if not indeed in general use in the churches. In 397 A.D. the Council of Carthage catalogued the books of the Canon.

Miss C. B., Niles, Mich., writes: "The Christian Herald of May 31, page 671, tells of a curious 'ice mine.' I lived in Decorah, Iowa, several years. There is an 'ice cave' there. Tourists come from many miles distant to visit it. It is a large cave, warm in winter, and from May to October it is cold, ice forming inside. Many scientific men have investigated it."

Truth, New Ulm, Minn. Of all the various religions and different sects, how are we to know which one is teaching the truth?

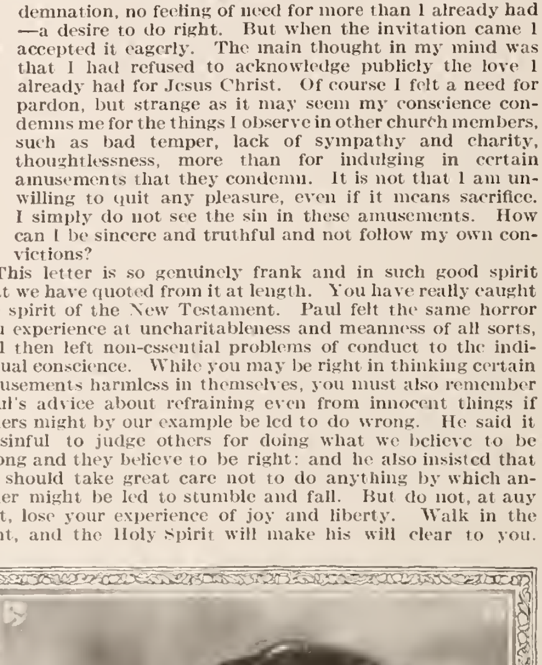
We must distinguish between essentials and non-essentials. Certain things are fundamental, and upon these all branches of Christ's church agree. Any honest seeker can find for himself the eternal truth about these fundamental things. It is a vast pity that there has been so much acrimonious discussion among Christians on matters considered by most denominations non-essential. It is small wonder that beginners in the Christian life and unbelievers here and in other lands have been bewildered by the sharp differences among Christians. Christ's real message was most simple: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength; and thy neighbor as thyself." The one great necessity is for every believing soul to get into the closest possible communion with God and then urge others to that same blessed fellowship. Doctrinal differences arise from different interpretations of the recorded words of Jesus and of the other Scriptures. Paul recognized the fact that Christians would differ about non-essentials, particularly in matters of conduct, when he urged: "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind" (Rom. 14 : 5). See also I Cor. 8, I Cor. 10 : 23-33, and all of Romans 14. The one great passion of Christ's heart was that men should let him lead them into the Father's fellowship, and then that they should show their love for God by helping and serving one another.

Subscriber, Oregon. For several years I have been trying very hard to cultivate self control. I have little or no power over myself; sometimes it is impossible for me to think of anything but that which discourages and confuses me. I am forced to think of these things against my will, regardless of how hard I try. I am positive I cannot overcome this in my own power. I dread the thought of the future. Have prayed to God earnestly for removal of the affliction but without result I cannot believe it to be his will, but I have such confusing thoughts.

James in the 3rd chapter of his letter, verses 14 to 18, distinguishes between a wisdom that brings confusion and one which brings peace. It is one of the fundamental characteristics of the real religion of Jesus that it does bring peace. So you may be sure that it is not his will that you should have these troubled thoughts. You see the trouble is, as we have told many other persons, in similar difficulties, you are not really trusting him. You are sure now that you cannot overcome this difficulty in your own power; you must go forward to the positive step of being sure that you can overcome it in his power. See again how beautiful that wisdom is that comes from above as James describes it—"pure, peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits." That is like the blessing which Isaiah describes (Isa. 55 : 9-11) as coming gently like the rain and snow from Heaven to do God's will and bring forth his fruit on the earth. You must take these and other great, soothing, comforting passages of the Bible and yield your will and your life to their power.

Michigan Convert. This spring I was converted in a tabernacle campaign. I had often wondered over the suddenness of Paul's conversion, but my own was almost as sudden. I went to the meeting with no sense of guilt or condemnation, no feeling of need for more than I already had—a desire to do right. But when the invitation came I accepted it eagerly. The main thought in my mind was that I had refused to acknowledge publicly the love I already had for Jesus Christ. Of course I felt a need for pardon, but strange as it may seem my conscience condemns me for the things I observe in other church members, such as bad temper, lack of sympathy and charity, thoughtlessness, more than for indulging in certain amusements that they condemn. It is not that I am unwilling to quit any pleasure, even if it means sacrifice. I simply do not see the sin in these amusements. How can I be sincere and truthful and not follow my own convictions?

This letter is so genuinely frank and in such good spirit that we have quoted from it at length. You have really caught the spirit of the New Testament. Paul felt the same horror you experience at uncharitableness and meanness of all sorts, and then left non-essential problems of conduct to the individual conscience. While you may be right in thinking certain amusements harmless in themselves, you must also remember Paul's advice about refraining even from innocent things if others might by our example be led to do wrong. He said it is sinful to judge others for doing what we believe to be wrong and they believe to be right: and he also insisted that we should take great care not to do anything by which another might be led to stumble and fall. But do not, at any cost, lose your experience of joy and liberty. Walk in the light, and the Holy Spirit will make his will clear to you.



My Dog

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

When my dog looks at yer friendly outer meltin' pretty eyes,
An' he wags his tail an' tries ter lick yer hand;
Then I don't care wot yer look like an' I don't care wot yer been,
Yer good enough fer me—yer understand?
Sometimes a human bein' judges by yer fancy coat,
An' if yer gloves an' shoes is new an' whole;
But a dog, when he looks at yer, doesn't notice little things;
A dog—a dog he judges by yer soul!

When my dog looks at yer friendly like he wants to see yer smile,
An' jumps upon yer, lovin', when yer call;
I'd like yer if yer was alone without a home 'r friend,
A burglar—tramp or anything at all!
Sometimes a human bein' likes yer surface—polished up—
Yer talk or table manners plays their part;
But a dog, when he looks at yer, goes beneath the top veneer;
A dog—a dog he judges by yer heart!

Anxious, Roxbury, Mass. How much can a Christian go in company with one who is not a Christian without feeling the effect of so doing?

Jesus did not hesitate at all to go into any company if he thought he could help. His attitude was always that of vigorous, positive, clean helpfulness. Whether he was associating with one person or a group, his thought and motive were always the same: "How can I help?" The human mind is so subtle and complex, however, that it is necessary to be careful in this matter of worldly companionship. Young and inexperienced Christians sometimes allow themselves to enjoy questionable associations, trying to persuade themselves that they are seeking to do good, when as a matter of fact they are merely gratifying a desire for selfish pleasure. But we can expect the Holy Spirit's direct guidance in these questions. He will tell us where it is safe and wise to go and where not. Most of all, it is necessary to seek and to find the highest possible spiritual experience, to have a rich blessing which we should like others to share. In the case you describe, it seems clear that you are right in associating with this friend because you evidently have this desire to help. You must try to help spiritually as well as to bring good cheer and comfort.

Inquirer, Pennsylvania. How would you warn a young boy of fifteen against the dangers of universalism?

We should take pains to impress upon all the young men and boys the inexorableness of the laws of righteousness sin. The recoil of sin is deadly and awful. "Whatsoever m soweth, that shall he also reap." Sin leaves the seed f penalties in brain and body and soul. The facts of sin forgiveness, atonement are ingrained in human li an thought. Tell the boys plainly and winsomely about t pl of Christ to come and save us from sin and its penalties planting within us a new spirit of devotion to God and e f men.

B., California. Supposing a Christian who really has kin heart makes a mistake and does some very unwis hi through lack of judgment If he asks God's forg n and that of the people he has wronged, is it neces y humiliate himself by confessing it to all his frier it right for him to allow his friends to have a high opin ion of him than he deserves, if he fully intends be more consecrated Christian in the future?

The necessity of confession is a strange but sure ct i human experience. A sin unconfessed rankles in t consciousness, and if still unconfessed goes down into t subconscious mind, producing all sorts of damage. The Sc tures direct that confession must be made to God and to thos hom we have wronged. They do not state that we must ma public confession, or even confession to a smaller circle associates. But every soul will experience a positive re and strengthening by confessing to some spiritually nded friend—one's pastor or some other mature and trusted C stian friend. This friend will advise whether the wrong is o ich a nature that one's companions in Christian work sh d be told of it. The laws of confession are not cruel; they are erely correct and scientific. We get relief, help, freedom, s ngth, peace, by confession. So in case of doubt it is usuall etter to go too far than not far enough. The Holy Spirit wi uide. Do not cast away your confidence and your liberty i esus. You are really required to confess only to him and those you have wronged. But a further confession does lp in some cases.

Reader, Chamal, Mexico. Why did the Christian urch that was established on the day of Pentecost n allow people to come into the church who had prope and why does the Christian Church of today allow peo with property to come into the church?

You have not read your New Testament quite acc tely The record of Acts 2 to 5 indicates clearly that the mei ers of this first group of believers were not required to give their property but did so voluntarily. Peter said disti y to Ananias: "While it remained, was it not thine own, a after it was sold, was it not in thine own power?" (Act : 4.) John Mark's mother still kept her house in Jerusale (Acts 12 : 12.) Other New Testament passages imply or st that church members possessed property. The whole stion was discussed quite fully in the notes on the Sunda choo lesson taken from these chapters of Acts. The Ne esta ment does, however, warn against the dangers and i stice of wealth, and insists upon the principles of sacrifice rvice and helpfulness. See especially James, chapters 2 ar 5. deeper and more difficult question is what constitute ctu ownership. The Christian cannot accept the positi tha possession is nine points of the law. He must sub t h title not to the laws of men, but of God. Much pro ty the present day has been wrongly acquired and is us kept from those to whom it rightfully belongs.

The Infantile Paralysis Epidemic

arb e cans too often hold tempting bits of watermelon ot r half-eaten delicacies that the neighbors' cats ave oroughly sampled before the children get a chance

WITH New York City as the storm center, the epidemic of infantile paralysis which began some time in the latter part of June has attacked possibly a score of ate and set in motion to oppose it health boards, un pal and state governments and the Federal ove ment itself, besides many civilian organiza- ons Its ravages would doubtless have been far eat but for the prompt precautions so widely ke At this writing the total number of cases hie ave been reported in all sections of the country, ut iefly in Brooklyn, aggregate under two thou- nd he total number of deaths about 300. Statis- cs not exact. One of the chief dangers of in- eas lies in the concealment of suspected cases, wh h there may be hundreds; another danger lies th ndue fear that every case of mental or physical epr ion in little children may be an attack of this our.

Th battle with this epidemic has been dramatic. he sease is one which baffles the medical scientist. h been known a good many years and has left s te ible imprint upon hundreds, in addition to its greater toll of deaths. But it is still, to use a familiar figure from the Scriptures, like the wind, which "bloweth where it listeth, and we hear the sound thereof, and know not whence it cometh nor whither it goeth." Dr. Simon Flexner, who is at the head of the Rockefeller Institute, and has achieved world-wide renown because of his investigations in connection with this disease, is quoted in an article in the New York Times of July 9 as follows:

> Infantile paralysis seems to pick the strong and well children, in preference to the weak. Vigorous health seems to be no protection against the disease.
> The infectious agent enters the body chiefly, if not exclusively, through the mucous membranes of the nose and throat. Poliomyelitis, or infantile paralysis, affects chiefly, but not exclusively, young persons; it may and not infrequently does affect adults, and no age is absolutely free of danger of infection.
> The virus of infantile paralysis exists in the secretions of the nose and throat and in the intestines. Hence the mode of spread may be by kissing, coughing, and sneezing, which carry the secretions of the nose and throat from one person who may be infected to other persons.
> Since the disease attacks by preference young children and infants whose nasal and mouth secretions are wiped away by mother or nurse, the fingers of these persons readily become contaminated. The care of other children by persons with contaminated fingers may, therefore, lead to the conveying of the infectious micro-organism indirectly from the sick to the healthy. This danger also exists in connection with vendors of food which is eaten uncooked. Dissemination can be made by means of house flies.
> Treatment involves isolation of the acutely ill, proper care and destruction of contaminated discharges, supervision of persons in contact with the ill and of all vendors of food, exclusion of all flies, and general sanitary control of the personnel and habitations of families in which the disease exists. The disease is one that can be communicated by healthy persons who have been in contact with the sick, but who are themselves well.

Little has been said in addition to this. It is quite impossible to give the public exact information, because physicians are still admittedly ignorant of the primary cause and equally of the cure. Two things the public has been advised to do, however; one to avoid getting into a panic, the other to keep all children as far as possible from the dangers of infection through unsanitary surroundings and contact with children and adults who may reasonably be suspected of having been in contact with the disease.

A little mother of the East Side

THE fight in New York and vicinity has taken on quite a spectacular turn. One of the first acts of the authorities was to close the moving picture theaters to children under the age of sixteen, a move that will be a costly one for these houses, and of course a really serious deprivation to thousands of families. Soda fountains and similar possible mediums of communication of the disease were closed in many stores. Playgrounds are also closed, and even the privileges of the street for play were denied children in many quarters of the city. Sunday schools finally decided to close for the balance of the summer, most excursions were called off, and at last even the charitable institutions began to put up the bars against the acceptance of children for promiscuous care.

A great exodus of children was started from New York and Brooklyn, but this escape was speedily denied the frightened parents, for health officers were placed at all points of departure to put every child through a rigid examination before permitting it to leave the city. And in all surrounding towns health boards and police departments promulgated emergency rules denying admittance to their towns to children from infected regions. Towns even imposed upon their own residents the obligation of placing their children in quarantine if they were taken away and returned during the life of the epidemic.

It was a very great gratification to the management of the Christian Herald Children's Home at Nyack, N. Y., to find that the health and medical regulations always enforced by them were so thorough that no restriction whatever was placed upon the operation of the Home at the beginning of the trouble. And it was only when for precautionary reasons the surrounding towns began to erect all kinds of bars that the health authorities of Nyack considered

The Divine Forces at Work

*A SERMON BY PASTOR CHARLES M. SHELDON

TEXT—John 5 : 17. "My Father works unceasingly, and so do I."

THE greatest thing in the world is the Kingdom of God, and it is the greatest thing because it is not founded on the power of money. It does not owe its existence to standing armies or navies, to social rank, to birth or physical power. It is a thing which exists in the heart of humanity, and therefore contains all the elements of permanency and future endurance. The most real, the most true, the most important of all forces in the world are the forces which have to do with conduct. In the shaping of nations, in the building of governments, in the welfare of the people, that which lies at the bottom of all true human progress and happiness is the permanent righteousness in the hearts of the people. The President of the United States in one of his recent public addresses sums up everything by stating this fact: "That, after all has been said, we must come back to the individual righteousness of the people themselves for the stability and happiness of human life."

The genius of Christianity lies in its possibility to produce this kind of righteousness in the individual. It is tested by its fruits. Christ founded no cities, he wrote no books, he built up no armies or navies; but he did lay down certain great principles of conduct which have energized the whole world throughout nineteen centuries and are energizing the world today more than ever. The little word "do" is at the heart of the genius of the principles which he laid down. The creed of Christ was summed up in two articles: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, mind, soul and strength; and thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Out of these two articles of the greatest creed ever announced have grown all the things that are worth while in our civilization.

I think it is a fair test of what Christianity has done in the world, a fair view of it, as it is at work, to ask: What do we owe to this great force in history in the way of institutions which are at work to establish righteousness among men? In other words, what have we now in our civilization which the world did not possess when Christ was born into it? Christianity can bear the test of its own statement, "By their fruits ye shall know them," and in asking the question, What has Christianity left with the world that is worth while? we may say that Christ was the most practical person that ever lived, using that word in the sense that he believed in the actual doing of things in the making of life. He was not a useless visionary or dreamer. He was not a mystic in the sense that he never went further than dreaming of what might be done; he was an energizer of life so that the working out of his teachings has resulted in every-day, practical, useful and tremendously beneficent phases of work which are with us in our civilization, permeating everything as the forces of nature permeate the entire earth. We will ask the question then, What has Christianity done in two thousand years? What do we possess in our civilization which Christ himself never saw, which Paul himself never dreamed of?

We have the organized church in the world. Historically, it has at many times been shown to be very imperfect. It has contained many times very sinful men. It has been used often for political and ecclesiastical purposes. It has in many individual cases not been a representative of Christ. But all through the ages it has contained, in spite of all weakness and evil, the leaven of Christ's teaching. It is in the world today a potent and living force. Under any condition, the church is an institution which represents Christianity at work in a variety of ways, and I believe it contains within itself life always, the germ of that which is real and true and for which the hungering spirit of man will always yearn. With the church goes of necessity the work of the Sunday school, giving free public instruction on great religious themes to millions of children all round the world. There is no other institution known to men which compares with the Sunday school for influence and power in the way of Bible instruction.

THE great missionary enterprises of the world are the work of Christianity, a thing entirely unknown in the time of Christ, in fact a thing unknown to Christendom a little over one hundred years ago. There are at present in the world 16,618 foreign missionaries. There are 3,613,391 communicants and adherents. Under the different missionary boards of Christendom, there are 947 hospitals and dispensaries where, in the course of the year, are treated on an average 2,545,500 cases. This is at least a beginning, which goes to show what the church might do, if it once got to work in earnest to Christianize the world.

Connected with the church, of necessity, as another institution which was not in existence when Christ was born, are the Young People's Societies which have come into being within the last quarter of a century. They number at present between six and eight million members, and are a practical, everyday, living force for righteousness. It would not be possible to give the results of what has been known as the Young People's Movement in actual, practical details of human energy, in efforts toward better citizenship, temperance legislation, the relief of suffering, prison reform, the betterment of home life, the relief of unjust conditions affecting child labor. In these and many other forms of practical righteousness, the young life of our Christian societies has gone out as a potent force to be counted.

Closely connected with the church as an institution go the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations, which I do not think existed very strongly in the mind of Paul. Last year, seven million dollars were spent by the Young Men's Christian Association of North America. Seventy new buildings went up, at a cost of three million dollars. Four million dollars more went for extending the work at home and abroad, and it is reckoned that over ten millions will be expended in new buildings this year. The Young Men's Christian Association enrolls four hundred thousand members in America and three hundred thousand more in thirty-nine foreign countries. The Young Women's Christian Association numbers at present in this country 150,000 members. It is, like the Young Men's Christian Association, a purely unselfish body, the direct offspring of Christian principles nurtured in the church of Christ. We cannot conceive of these two splendid institutions without a church preceding them. Things do not grow by chance. Seeds are not sown without a hand to sow them. Things do not spring up by magic, but back of them there lies a definite and well-organized cause.

CHRIST never saw a temperance association. Yet the temperance organizations of the world owe their existence to his spirit. It is, of course, a significant fact that Christ never said anything, so far as we know, on the subject of drink. Intemperance was probably a common thing in his own time, just as slavery was. Under the irresistible pressure of the principles he laid down of supreme love to God and man, slavery has been obliged to retire from civilization, and the same pressure is being brought to bear now all over the world against the liquor business as a business, and it is undeniably due to the fact that Christ came into the world.

In the time of Christ or Paul there was not in existence a single hospital worthy of the name. There was not a single building erected by the state for the proper care of the blind, or the insane, or the mentally defective, or the criminal, except places which were rightly termed dungeons. In classic Greece, the pauper blind or insane and the helpless wandered in the fields or died on the hillsides, or were the sport of the mob and the idle crowd in the city. The cruelty of paganism surpasses our imagination. Under the head of what Christianity has done for the world must rightfully be placed a long list of public institutions for the relief of physical distress—hospitals, asylums, dispensaries, homes of refuge for the aged and blind, the deaf and dumb, the idiotic, the insane, the helpless. These, poorly managed as they sometimes are, and given up to the politician and the political highwayman for spoils, nevertheless are so far in advance of what was in existence in the time of Christ that they must be reckoned as the fruits of the creed of Him who went about doing good. When one tries to consider a world of civilization without a single asylum, without a refuge for old age, without a single place where the mentally deficient child could be taken; when one stops to consider the mountain of suffering and pain and humiliation and distress that existed when Christ walked among the multitude that asked him to heal, he gets some faint glimmer of the immense work Christianity has accomplished in the world of constant need.

There was no republic in the time of Christ. Liberty itself had its birth in the creed of Christ. The development of it into the form of human self-government has taken time; but Christianity at work has evolved a republic of men. It is the best we have thus far found, insofar as it is based upon the freedom and individuality of the race.

AMONG the forces at work at the very moment which are the result of Christ work is arbitration. Christ never heard of a

God's Terrible Answers

SNDAY, July 30. Ps. 65 : 5. "By terrible hings in righteousness wilt thou answer us, O God!" That is a disturbing paradox, the gracious Lord answering in terrible response. e lve some difficulty in thinking of grace expressing ielf in terror. It is the same strange conjunc- m hich the apostle John unveils to us in the ocypse. He saw "a Lamb in the midst of the roi" and yet out of the throne proceeded light- ig: If only some mild, soft light had streamed m he throne it would have seemed altogether ag ial; but lightnings! It is like the sound of rp s breaking into thunder. It is like "the soft is r of a going" over the tops of the trees, merging o he rumblings of an earthquake. A strange lo hip is this of grace expressing itself in "terrible ng"

Bi the great point to remember is just this: that trific thing can be the vehicle of grace. The m gly wild thing can carry a very gentle thing. e ghtning can enshrine the heart of the Lamb. r parent antagonisms are often the very servants o strength. If we had never been opposed we u never have found our power. Our capacity is co red in our seasons of deprivation. We come o lf-possession along terrible roads. God moves o n wintry snows to the coveted harvests. Why ul the frost be counted necessary in the process re ing the golden grain? Well, that is the ap- nt way. We find our honey in the carcasses of lis which we have slain. A lion often crouches w n us and the feast! The wilderness stretches w n us and Canaan! The Afterglow at Life's Eventide

I DAY, July 31. Zech. 14 : 1-8. "At even- le it shall be light." There can be no reason- e oubt that this passage refers to our Lord. e ophet's words in verse 4, "His feet shall stand th day upon the Mount of Olives," seems to ve ggested the assurance of Acts 1 : 11; and if so, m t refer to the future fulfilment of these pre- tio. "The Lord my God shall come, and all hy ones with thee."

Bu whatever the reference to the future may be, s tain that the revelation of the Saviour to the d y be described under the same terms as those pl ed in this paragraph, and especially in this ur ce for life's eventide. Old age, to those who ve quandered the past in frivolous or sinful as , is full of regret and dread; but for the Chris- n, sun, which may have been obscured in earlier mille life, shines out resplendently at the last. ere s a second summer, and a lovely afterglow. e siness that filled life with fever and anxiety g e into other hands. The Two Sides of Prayer

TUESDAY, August 1. Matt. 26 : 39. "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt." There are two distinct elements in the Christian's prayer—first, the specific request for something desired; second, the equally strong desire that God's will may be done. The prayer of our Lord in Gethsemane illustrates perfectly these two sides of prayer. He asked that the cup of suffering might pass from him, but his request was lodged in the firm background of obedience to the Father's will.

Prayer that is simply a selfish request to gratify a personal wish may be nothing but the expression of a petulant, self-willed child demanding his own way without regard to submission to the wiser judgment of his parent. On the other hand, prayer that does not express the petitioner's wish for something real and definite may become little more than the Moslem's fatalism, which passively fails to reach out to God with specific request, saying, "As Allah wills."

A friend was in deep trouble, and showed me a letter from a man which read simply: "I have prayed. God is good." That letter gave my friend a great hope. I asked, why? He answered: "I knew that this man prayed earnestly for my relief from the special difficulty, and I also knew that the man believed implicitly in God."

That is the test—believing in God as we pray.

The Scriptures Fulfilled in Christ

WEDNESDAY, August 2. Zech. 13 : 7 to 14 : 1. "Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of Hosts." These words were quoted by our Lord himself on the night of the betrayal. This was among all the other Scriptures which were fulfilled in him. Let us take to heart this wonderful phrase! We are not startled to learn that he is God's specially appointed Shepherd, who was to be smitten to death by the sword of malignant cunning and hatred. But that sublime designation, "the man that is my fellow," awakens thoughts and speculations which can only be resolved when we have spent some millenniums in the clear light of eternity. Here is a man, nay the man, the unique man, the man of whom all other men are broken fragments, the man who sums up all the dreams of psalmists and the predictions of history, all the ideals of the saints, all the attractiveness of supreme love; and this man is "the fellow of Jehovah."

Dare we say that he is God's other self! It is said of him that he thought it not robbery to be equal with God! But he was even more than that! "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." In the mystical relationship of the Holy Trinity, Jesus Christ was God; and for us men and our salvation, he became a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, and was God manifest in the flesh. The light is too dazzling for us, but when the Father bade the sword awake against his fellow, he thrust it into his own heart.

Traveling with a Purpose

THURSDAY, August 3. Phil. 3 : 14. "I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Jesus Christ." Traveling with a most discontented globe-trotter a few years ago through the Malay Peninsula, his attitude somewhat surprised me. He was extremely bored with everything and everybody. He said, "I do not have interest in these sights; I am tired at looking at these things and wish that I was home." Like many a traveler, he was touring about the world with no definite purpose; he had no object to inspire or to give point to his sightseeing, and was just drifting about more or less aimlessly.

Many a life appears to be like this—a journey with no clear intention, no governing and dominating aim. There is nothing to give meaning or dignity to work and play. It is just drifting. Unlike Paul, the person has no "mark" toward which he is constantly pressing.

Traveling with a purpose does not prevent one from enjoying the sights and pleasures along the way. The purposeful traveler sees the same things as does the drifter; but he sees them in relation to his great life aim, and all experiences gather consistency by being organized about a settled plan.

The Christian pilgrim has no right to journey with no fixed star in his heaven; if he does this, he is likely to get tired of life or become a mere machine. God wants every one to do something definite. He sent his Son into the world with a specific mission; he has a particular purpose for every one of us. How can we charge our working lives with such a determined, uplifting ideal?

Try writing over your life these words of Paul in the above text. It matters little what we do or where we do it, if only the consecration to the Spirit and the high calling of Christ's life actuate us; then all our acts will feel its impulse. Every small wave of daily routine that breaks ever so lightly along the shore of our life's business will feel behind it the heaving, solemn tide of God's great sea. To travel with a purpose is to travel in the consciousness of God's presence.

Jesus Beside the Crucible of Trial

FRIDAY, August 4. Mal. 3 : 1-12. "He shall sit as a refiner of silver." John was sent as a messenger to prepare the way of the Lord. He was as a herald who cries: "The King, the King!" and is forthwith lost to view. As the fulness of the time was fulfilled and men were looking for the King in one direction, He came in another. One day when the crowds were thronging the temple steps, and the world was resounding with its ordinary bustle and business, a peasant mother brought her first-born to the sacred precincts to present him to the Lord—two doves, the gift of the poor, the only offering she could afford—and at that moment the Lord came suddenly to his temple.

Under this Hebrew dress, the prophet enunciates a great truth: that the distinctive work of Jesus is to refine his people by trials sharp and searching as the furnace-heat employed to test and clarify gold and silver. He has one object in view—by making them holy to fit them "to offer spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." He alone can measure the need, and he permits no other hand to apply the discipline. Whatever the immediate instrument may be by which the work is done, it is the Lord that directs it. If we are apparently in the hand of the enemy as Job was, yet the enemy cannot go further than he permits. And it is a beautiful conception that Jesus sits beside the crucible. He is very present in time of trouble. No other friend may be there, but Jesus holds the sufferer's right hand. The refiner marks every change in the metal, and nothing is left to chance. He waits to arrest the process at the right moment. His only desire is to see the scum float away, the flickering waves of vapor expire, and his own face reflected in the clear, translucent, liquid silver.

The Benedictus of Zacharias

SATURDAY, August 5. Luke 1 : 64. "And Zacharias' tongue was loosed, and he praised God, shouting, Blessed be the Lord of Israel; for he hath visited and redeemed his people." The tongue of the dumb shall sing when the Holy Spirit of God brings blessed news to the soul. Unbelievers may be voiceless, but let everything that hath the breath of faith praise the Lord, because we may all serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness all the days of our life.

St. Augustine said of this song: "O blessed hymn of joy and praise, divinely inspired by the Holy Ghost! Oh, may thy words be often in my mouth, and the sweetness of them always in my heart! The expressions thou usest are the comfort of my life; and the subject thou treatest of the hope of all the world!" Praise, the perfume of the flowers of the heart, rises like incense unto the highest heaven. One has said: "Let me make the songs of a people and I care not who makes their laws."

Was it not the Holy Spirit's inspiration that burst forth in Zacharias' song? Such effusions rise from soul rapture without preparation or previous meditation. It is as if heaven had set the soul on fire with love, and like David, giving expression to noblest feeling, it exclaims, "The Lord hath put a new song into my mouth, even praise unto our God."

HOME RULE IN IRELAND. As a direct result of the Irish rebellion, and following the personal investigation of Premier Asquith, the government on July 10 announced in the House of Commons that a bill for the establishment of a government for Ireland on lines agreed to by the Nationals and Unionists would be submitted to Parliament within a week and that the bill would be recommended by the cabinet. Mr. Asquith said that the Imperial Parliament and government retained authority over the army and navy in all matters arising out of the war. He indicated that six Ulster counties would be excluded from the Irish government and that the Irish members would retain their present seats in the Imperial Parliament. The Appeal Court in Dublin is to be appointed by the imperial executive. The bill would be provisional and will remain in force during the war and twelve months thereafter. The new Irish government will probably not be instituted before early in 1917. It appears that the compromise bill will have a stormy course through Parliament. In the first discussion in the House of Lords, Lord Lansdowne proposed a plan for provisional government in Ireland, suggesting a garrison of 40,000 troops, which he held strong enough to preserve order. Mr. Redmond replied in the Commons, declaring that Lord Lansdowne's suggestion was an insult and that the enactment of it into law would be a gross breach of faith with Ireland, whose leaders had agreed to the putting into effect of the Home Rule Act of 1914, subject to certain modifications, which were all on the same footing.

GULF STORM DESTROYS. A storm which swept the Gulf coast of Mississippi, Alabama and Florida July 6 and 7 caused damage estimated at four millions of dollars to railroads, shipping and growing crops, and at least seven persons lost their lives.

AMERICAN CAN MAY LIVE. Judge Rose of the United States District Court at Baltimore on July 7 denied the government's petition for the dissolution of the American Can Company. He also refused the defendant's petition for the dismissal of the case, retaining for his court jurisdiction. Any return on the part of the company to illegal trade practices will reopen the case and result in a decree of dissolution.

RUSSIA AND JAPAN STRIKE HANDS. The Japanese Foreign Office made public on July 7 the substance of a treaty of alliance recently entered into by Japan and Russia. Each country agrees not to participate in any political arrangement or combination against the other, and the two countries promise mutual support and cooperation in case the territorial rights or special interests of either are menaced. Premier Okuma stated to a New York Times correspondent that the new treaty was an extension of the Anglo-Japanese alliance and aimed only to preserve the peace in the Far East. The premier declared that the open commercial door in China, opened by American diplomacy under former Secretary of State John Hay, would not be closed, and that American commercial and industrial activity in China would be heartily welcomed by Japan. The new alliance was enthusiastically received by the people of Japan.

ON THE WORD OF A KING. New Hampshire and Vermont are engaged in litigation in the United States Courts to determine the exact location of the boundary between the states. In 1764, by decree of the English king, the western boundary of New Hampshire was designated as the west bank of the Connecticut River, and this boundary was recognized by Vermont. In late years industrial establishments have been erected on made land adjoining the former west bank of the river, and the present proceeding is the result of the attempts of both states to levy taxes on this newly created property.

A THOUSAND SHIPS. The Bureau of Navigation of the Department of Commerce announces that in the last year the American ship-yards have built 1,030 new ships with a total tonnage of 347,847. The largest steamer built was the H. H. Rogers, 10,050 gross tons.

THE PRICE OF A STEAK. The United States Department of Agriculture has recently issued some interesting computations bearing on the reasons for the high retail meat prices now prevailing. It is shown that from 1907 to 1913 there was a marked decrease in the number of cattle in the country. Since 1913 there has been a steady increase in the number of animals, but an increase not as great in proportion as the increase in population. On January 1, 1907, there were 72,534,000 cattle on the farms and ranges of the United States; on January 1, 1916, there were 61,441,000. Between January 1, 1910, and January 1, 1916, the number of hogs in the country increased from 58,000,000 to 68,000,000, and the number of sheep decreased from 52,500,000 to 49,200,000. It is estimated that since 1910 the annual losses of cattle from disease have exceeded 1,100,000 and from exposure another 1,000,000. Equally large numbers of sheep have been lost from the same causes, while the loss of hogs due to hog cholera mounted in 1914 to 7,000,000. We import some beef from Argentina and Australia, and we export, largely, pork and pork products. With the passing of the ranges the cost of production of meats is rising and the department very thoughtfully reminds us that, in line with a world-wide movement, the purchasing price of the dollar is decreasing.

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

ADMIRAL JELLICOE has rendered his official report of the late naval battle. This report is very long and highly technical, and only the summary can be given. The admiral admits the loss of the Queen Mary, Indefatigable, Invincible, Defense, Black Prince, Warrior, Tipperary, Ardent, Fortune, Shark, Sparrowhawk, Nestor, Nourad and Turbulent, and a heavy loss of life.

He admits that the following other vessels suffered severe casualties during the fighting: Southampton, Dublin, Onslow, Defender, Chester, Acasta, Christopher, Warspite, Marlborough, (torpedoed), Calliope Onslaught. He claims to have sunk the following ships of the enemy: two battleships of the dreadnought type, one battle cruiser, five light cruisers, six torpedo boat destroyers, one submarine. This is an increase of one dreadnought, two light cruisers and one submarine over the German admissions.

Admiral Jellicoe, a brave officer and a gallant gentleman, thus refers to the enemy: "The enemy fought with the gallantry we had expected of him. We particularly admired the conduct of those on board a disabled German light cruiser which passed down the British line shortly after the deployment under a heavy fire, which it returned with the only gun left in action."

Since the publication of this report on July 8, the British admiralty has made a statement to the effect that they have received proof which they deem convincing to the effect that the Germans lost two superdreadnoughts, the Kaiser and Kronprinz, and that they will include these vessels in the list of German losses, but do not disclose the nature of this proof, so that we are unable to judge its weight.

Lloyd George has become the British minister of war, with Lord Derby as under secretary.

As a result of the past week's fighting the Austro-Italian line is practically unchanged, though the Italians claim minor gains at separated points on the Adige-Brenta front. The Italians also claim that the strength of their offensive has forced the Austrians to bring back to this front troops which they had withdrawn for use on the eastern front. The Austrians reported the sinking of four or five British patrol boats in the Straits of Otranto by the Austrian cruiser Novara, nine of the crews of these vessels being saved. The British say that there were only three vessels sunk, however.

We have at last heard from the Mesopotamia front, and the British are stated to be at Sannayat, 15 miles below Kut-el-Amara, exactly where they were when we last heard from them. Great Britain, it is reported by the Rotterdam Courant, has ordered Holland to cease the exportation of manufactured goods to neutral countries. In this connection it is well to remember that Holland a few weeks ago announced, apropos of nothing at the time, that her army was prepared for any eventualities. However, in the present case, her army will avail her nothing, as the penalty for non-compliance with Great Britain's arbitrary orders will be the prompt stoppage of her entire cotton imports.

IN the Allies' Picardy offensive, on the west front, the first phase of the movement, as far as the French north and south of the Somme River are concerned, finished on Saturday, July 8, and found them with well-developed echelons to the north and south of Péronne, their primary objective. The second phase would be, of course, to convert these echelons into a solid by bringing them together, in which operation, if successfully carried out, Péronne would necessarily fall. This echelon disposition, by the way, is one of the very few of the classic military dispositions of attack which have survived the changes of this war.

Judge John H. Clarke

Nominated to the United States Supreme Court

On Saturday, the French were occupied both north and south of the river in repulsing German counter-attacks intended to break up this disposition, which they did successfully. On Sunday, the French made an advance in the center on a three-mile line running south from the Somme River to Belloy-en-Santerre, forcing the northern end of that line forward over a mile to and into the village of Biaches, the southern end of the line pivoting on Belloy, thus partly closing the space between the echelons.

They followed up the advantage of the day before by capturing, on Tuesday, Hill No. 97, southeast of Biaches, which capture accentuated the closing of the space between the north and south echelons, and was of some considerable importance in itself, in that the summit of Hill No. 97 is higher than Péronne and thus commands that town.

During the rest of the week the French remained quiet in the positions already gained, for the reason that the British north of the river Somme had not advanced in proportion to them, and that, consequently, the French left flank was somewhat dangerously exposed, so that any further forward movement by them would be imprudent until the British had advanced sufficiently to cover this left flank, which result had not been brought about when this record closed.

The British on their portion of the front, running northward for fifteen miles from the end of the French left flank, had a week of continuous but rather resultless fighting until Friday, July 14. This fighting centered largely around the ruins of the village of Contalmaison and the Mametz and Trones woods, which changed hands several times. Thus the line swayed continuously to and fro until Thursday afternoon, when the British succeeded in recapturing all the ground lost by them and in reestablishing their line completely on the positions occupied by it at the moment of the greatest advance, which it had previously attained on July 2. During Thursday night and on Friday these positions were improved and in their center on a four-mile front they drove forward a mile, capturing the villages of Longeval and Bazentin-le-Grand, the first at the intersection of the Bapaume-Bray and Albert-Combles highways, and the second to the east of Contalmaison. Heavy fighting in this sector was still going on when this record closes.

All told, to date, the Allies claim to have taken a trifle over 20,000 prisoners in this offensive, while the Germans claim to have captured between 3,000 and 4,000 in their counter-attacks. The casualties on both sides, it is perhaps needless to say, have been very heavy.

ON the Verdun fronts there have been the usual bombardments, varied by occasional unimportant raids. Tuesday the Germans launched a strong infantry attack on the whole eastern half of the north front and succeeded in getting a footing in the Fumin wood and the Damloup battery farther east. On Wednesday this success was followed up and the Germans moved their line forward south of Fort Vaux, nearly to Fort de Souville and the La Laufée redoubt, directly to the east of this fort and about a mile distant, thus bringing the left of their line in this sector up to the German line running east from Côte de Froid Terre, through Fleury, to the Le Chapitre ridge.

The next two days the Germans occupied themselves with consolidating the ground won, and in bombarding the Souville-La Laufée line violently, evidently in preparation of an infantry assault on this line in the near future.

IN the Caucasus the Turks are still driving back the Russian left wing in western Persia, and in the center holding their own. The Russian left wing on the Black Sea south and southwest of Trebizond seems to be gradually forced back to that city.

The Russian front has been on the whole quiet during the past week over most of its length. North of the Pripet marshes to the Gulf of Riga there have been some skirmishes, but none of any particular importance, or even leading to operations of greater importance. South of the marshes in the early part of the week there was some rather intense fighting to the east of Baranovichi, but this was barren of results to either side and gradually died away.

The line of the north Stochod river, however, was the scene of most desperate fighting nearly all the week, and the struggle apparently is not near an end when these lines are written. The Russians are making desperate efforts to cross this river and to strike at Kovel from the northeast, while the Germans are just as desperately forbidding the passage. Up to the present, in spite of enormous casualties, neither side can be said to have gained any important advantage or even the upper hand, so that the daily incidents of the struggle are without any real meaning.

South of this on the Lutsk front, there were no new developments, which was also the case in Galicia and Bukowina, where the fighting seems waiting on the result of the Stochod battles.

Finding Pharaoh's Palace

BIBLE students throughout the world will be interested in the announcement of the remarkable discovery, by the Eckley B. Cox Expedition to Egypt, of a long-buried palace at Memphis which Dr. Clarence S. Fisher, leader of the expedition, believes to be the palace of Pharaoh Meremptah. Should this "find" be verified, it will doubtless be hailed by archeologists as one of the most important of the present day. Menepthah or Meremptah was the son of Rameses the Great, and has been identified by several eminent authorities as the Pharaoh during whose reign the Israelitish Exodus occurred. In excavating the palace, the workers found evidences of a spacious and finely decorated chamber about sixty feet in length, which they surmised to have been a royal reception or throne room, "possibly identical with the one in which Moses and Aaron confronted Egypt's ruler with the demand that the people of Israel be permitted to go," and where that memorable night-scene may have occurred which is described in Ex. 12 : 30-32, when the terror of the plague wrung from Pharaoh the consent to their departure. A collection of rare relics in the building indicated that it had been either the private collection of the monarch himself, or a public museum under the royal auspices. It is only a year ago since the temple of Meremptah was unearthed, but there have been few notable "finds" of palaces in Egypt, and none at Memphis till now. Menepthah, when he came to the throne, was a man of mature years, and Seti, his son, was the virtual ruler, his father being such in name only. Seti is alluded to as "the first-born of Pharoah who sat on the throne," and the record of his achievements, which has been found, shows him to have been notable both as a soldier and administrator. Archeologists have reached the conclusion that Seti may have been the Pharaoh who perished in the Red Sea with his horses and his chariots and his mighty hosts, the old monarch having sent his vigorous soldier son to perform a duty which, owing to age and feebleness, he could not have undertaken himself—the pursuit and recapture of the Israelites, whom in a moment of weakness he had consented to let go.

Making Our Democracy Real

THE United States is a democracy after all. Once or twice the Christian Herald has felt it to be its duty to complain that the present administration has not been sufficiently attentive to the wishes of the people, particularly in the matter of fixing the nation's foreign policy, and specially with a view to avoiding needless complications and the peril of war. But during the recent alarming crisis with Mexico President Wilson did listen to what the people had to say about going to war. In explaining his course just after the crisis had passed he declared emphatically that it was the voice of the people, the common people, that had made him determine to avoid a clash with our sister republic. He found out that the people did not want war, and so threw the whole weight of his powerful intelligence, strong will and official authority against it.

But suppose the people had not spoken. Suppose that you, and you, and you had not written that letter or sent that telegram or attended that meeting which drew up a set of earnest resolutions and forwarded them to Washington! The President would not have known that the country did not want war and might have yielded to the terrific forces that were thrusting him to a break with Mexico.

One New York citizen was so distressed about the threatening war cloud and so convinced that a war with Mexico on the pretexts presented would have been wicked and unjust that he said to a friend in despair: "Tell me what I can do. I feel that I must do something, but I see nothing that I can do." The friend was a peace expert and a leader of the peace forces of America. "Telegraph the President," he said. "I am sending out messages to a lot of my friends urging them to telegraph." So the inquirer sent a telegram at once, and followed it the same afternoon with another telegram, and the next day wrote a letter. To one telegram and to the letter he received replies from the President's secretary. It was, of course, impossible to acknowledge the receipt of the many thousands of messages that poured into the White House during those anxious days, but they had their effect. They saved the day for peace.

Do not forget the lesson. The President has declared positively that he considers it his duty to execute the will of the people. He can not know what that will is unless you tell him. Be ready when another crisis approaches either in our internal affairs or in our relations with other nations. Keep posted. Find out what is going on. Have convictions—deep convictions, strong convictions—then when the time comes express these convictions in a terse telegram or letter to Washington. Tell your friends to do the same. Get your church and community to think as you do and then to express themselves in messages to Washington. There is a better chance than ever before for the American people to assert the real power of their democracy. The professional politician is at a discount. The President has declared that he will not allow great financial interests to press him against his convictions and his conscience. All this means that the people not only have the right to speak, but that their expressions will be heard and their will obeyed.

A Sub-Atlantic Saga

WONDERFUL beyond the range of romance is the story of the voyage beneath the Atlantic of the submarine liner Deutschland and her daring crew. Jules Verne, in his famous story "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea," pictured a pleasure-going submersible; but the creation of his imagination and her adventures are puerile alongside of those of the 315-foot liner, playing hide-and-seek with her armed foes, one moment on the surface, the next hundreds of feet below, and not even reported as having been sighted once on her 4,000-mile voyage. Who will write the saga of the sub-Atlantic adventure of those heroic souls, singing and banqueting in unapproachable deeps, far from the storms that raged above; then, like a swift, huge cetacean, the wondership darting ahead and holding her course in blackest mid-sea, almost as true and straight as a regular liner on the surface? There were reefs and shoals to guard against and above were armed enemies, ready to attack and sink the defenseless vessel; but with unequaled skill she was steered through all the perils of the ocean labyrinth and brought safely to her port of destination.

While the maiden sub-Atlantic trip of the Deutschland may prove important commercially, as opening up a new field for international traffic, it must be regarded as epoch-making in a higher sense. One of the finest aspects of this wonderful achievement is that the undersea boat, heretofore a type of terror and destruction, comes to us wholly unarmed, and no longer an instrument for war but for peace. It is true, the feat she has accomplished may largely be the means of revolutionizing the world's ideas on naval armaments, and may even relegate the old notions of sea-supremacy to the junkheap; but her exploit will live in the memories of men chiefly for the sake of the splendid courage and the rare skill of her hardy crew, who accomplished the seemingly impossible. No matter to what side one's sympathies may lean in the present war, all must join in the recognition of the stuff that real heroes are made of, and in praise of the bravery of the men who risked their lives in an adventure as thrilling as any that has come down to us through the ages.

More About High Meat Prices

WE gladly give space to the following communication, which presents "the other side" of the discussion relative to the prevailing high meat prices. It is only just that the packers should have a hearing.

Editor, The Christian Herald:

In the "Editorial Forum" of the Christian Herald, issue of June 28, there is an article, "Forcing up Prices," which refers to the Standard Oil Company and the Beef Trust. The article says that the Beef Trust has steadily forced up the price to the retailers for the past two years, and refers to arbitrary manipulation of commodity prices and states that the government must find a way of protecting the people from being plundered and exploited. The character and standing of the Christian Herald are such that we know its policy is to publish the facts, and that there is an unwillingness to make comments that are not justified.

We do not think the use of the words "Beef Trust" is very fair. We desire to say that Swift & Company do not control prices. We do not arbitrarily raise or lower them; neither do we desire to do so. We are neither plundering nor exploiting the public. We believe we are performing a valuable service to the country and have built up a very large business on the only basis on which a large business can be built up, namely, on the basis of fair and honorable dealing. No doubt the Christian Herald believes that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and our hire for the efficient service we render is a very moderate profit; so small as not to be a factor in the price the producer receives for his live stock, nor in the price that the consumer pays for his meat.

Regarding the question of prices: The present price of beef is very high. We have been selling it, the last month or two, three to four cents higher than we were six months ago, and from two to three cents per pound more than a year ago. The cause of this high price is the unprecedentedly high p es fo live cattle. With fat steers bringing over eleven c s pe pound, alive, it is not to be wondered at that our sales o esse beef to the retail dealer should average about thirte cent per pound, dressed weight. These prices for cattle, a pro portionate ones for other live stock, are being paid to e pro ducer and feeder; the packers are not benefiting by t m, a they have not in the last few months averaged their cu mar small margin of profit.

The increases are forced by supply and demand. I s tru that the supply this year is greater than last, neverth ss th demand has increased out of all proportion to the pply The demand is due largely to the increased purchasin powe of the consumer. There are more men and women a work they are working longer hours and at higher rates of pa onse quently they have more money to pay for meat; and t re a more buyers of meat at the retail markets. As to eth the packers plunder and exploit the public or not w ld b shown by the profits they make.

Swift & Company's earnings are certified by public a oun ants. Last year they were certified as $14,000,000. e dis tributive sales were in excess of $500,000,000, so that th rofit averaged 2.8 cents on each dollar of sales. This is best year that Swift & Co. have had, caused by earnings the foreign plants, whose products were sold abroad. ift & Company's profit from the slaughter of cattle in the nited States in 1915 is certified by public accountants at ⅛ a cen per pound, live weight. This profit includes beef, h s an by-products, and is as much as they have averaged du g th past four or five years. We ask whether these ma ns o profit justify the Herald's comments? We are able to m e sat isfactory returns to our shareholders from these small rgin of profit only because of the enormous volume of our b ines

We stand ready at all times to furnish any data the C istia Herald may ask. We feel that offhand criticism of ge in dustries works a hardship on all and are willing to do pa to give accurate information of our side.

Chicago, Illinois. SWIFT & COM NY.

The Christian Herald does believe that the bore is worthy of his hire, but equally true is it t t th consumer is entitled to fair treatment and fu value for his money. The Chicago firm admits that t price of beef is very high, and points out what it gards as the legitimate reasons or causes, the high rices for live cattle. Even considering everything at is adduced by way of explanation, the fact still r mains that the big burden rests on the consumer. Th e is a strong impression that it rests upon him too l vily. Of course, it is true that, owing to the activit f the labor market, the people have more money to y for meat, and one finds it difficult to escape the co ction that this single fact has much to do with the i rease against which they are now protesting. At all ents, investigation may bring some relief, and if all thers interested came to the front as promptly the Chicago firm has done, we might soon have a earer light, showing not only where the shoe pinch mos heavily, but possibly how the pressure mi t be relieved.

The Woman Suffrage Outlook

IN a quiet but substantial fashion, equal s frage is making material headway. Three part plat-forms have now recognized it in enco aging terms. The Democratic platform favors "its a ption by states upon the same terms as to men." The Republican platform also favors it "and rec nize the right of each state to settle the question for self. The Progressive platform recommends that the ome of the nation be given "the full political r it o suffrage either by state or Federal action." I s les than half a century since the first state, Wy ning led the van of the movement, and now in te othe states the sexes have equal suffrage, while tw mor states have granted partial suffrage to the men In a number of others they have for years pa bee exercising the right to vote at school and mu cipa elections. Thus the outlook all along the line n b set down as distinctly favorable, and as foresha win the time not far distant when equal suffrage ill b the rule everywhere on American soil. A p asin feature of this promising situation is that all t t ha been granted has come, not through sen ion clamor and disturbing agitation, but by the s adil growing conviction that the claims of the wo n ar founded on reasonableness and justice.

Pier Coffer-Dam Opened

IN the presence of a large party of city officials and others, Mayor Mitchel the other day opened the gates of the coffer-dam that has kept back the waters of the Hudson since the beginning of work on the new 1,000-foot piers at West Forty-sixth Street, New York. After the Dock Commissioner had made a short speech explaining the work and giving full credit to the engineers who carried it out, Mayor Mitchel turned the crank that opened the gates and allowed the water of the Hudson, dammed for fifteen manths, to run into the excavation where the slips are to be. Work on the coffer-dam was begun in April, 1914. About 55,000 000 gallons of water was pumped out of the areas inclosed, which covered five and a half acres. From behind the dam about 2,187,000 cubic feet of rock was blasted and removed. According to Commissioner Smith, for a coffer-dam of this self-supporting type, the work far exceeds in height of dam, height of waterhead, and general dimensions any other work of its kind thus far undertaken. The work on the superstructure will be begun at once, and when it is finished there will be four 1,000-feet piers for the docking of ships from all lands. It is a significant fact that these new piers will be valueless unless other excavations are made. The water in the new slips will be thirty-five feet deep, sufficient to berth the largest ships afloat, but the basin is at present effectually bottled up by a shoal opposite its mouth, over which there are only twenty-twa feet of water at mean low tide. Before this shoal can be removed Cangress must authorize a survey of the river, and if this survey is not authorized immediately and completed in time for Congress to vote the money for dredging out the shoal when it reconvenes in December, the piers may be completed before the channel is cleared. The merchant marine of olden times is thus mentioned: "They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters." (Ps. 107 : 23.)

Tblet to Admiral Mahan

N e Summer Chapel of the Atone- n t, at Quogue, N. Y., a tablet in en y of Rear-Admiral Alfred Thayer Mah, the great authority on sea ow is unveiled. It reads: "Great mo the nations as an expounder of a wer; greater in the kingdom of od; an example of a Christian man." dm al Mahan was one of the ablest and best naval officers of the country. His writings were so clear and strong on the subject that he was the acknowledged authority among most nations on sea power. The words on the tablet are singularly appropriate. The biggest thing in the world is to be a true Christian. The accumulation of wealth, even in fabulous quantities, the mastery of land or sea power, the applause of the multitudes, are nothing to the real wealth, power, or praise of a consistent Christian life. The most modest mechanic or day laborer living on some obscure street or alley, the poor widow who slaves at the wash-tub to clothe, feed and school her children, who love Christ and fellow men, and do their duty each day in the fear of the Lord in the building up of God's kingdom, will stand higher and be more richly rewarded in all the centuries to come than those who admire earthly success and have omitted the one thing needful. The paramount importance of the kingdom of God marked in the church tablet at Quogue is here referred to: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." (Matt. 6 : 33.)

Ancient Penny Discovered

A MATE for the New Jersey penny sold recently for $900 has been discovered by William C. Cook, of Branchville, N. J. Mr. Cook, a former mayor of Branchville, has kept the money for twenty-two years. It was coined by the state of New Jersey in 1786, and was found in a garden, the present site of the First National Bank. When the Lewis coin was sold it was said there was but one other like it. Mr. Cook's penny is in good condition. The date is quite legible, as is the inscription on one side—"Nova Cæsarea." What an interesting story the penny could tell if it could speak, of beginning at the birth of the new republic that cost the colonists so much of suffering and of blood, and which meant so much to them and to the whole world, and now dug out of its grave of generations to behold the greatness and glory of the American commonwealth! What a coincidence that the coin should have been found in the garden at the very spot on which the bank now stands! What a strange inscription for a coin of the free state in a new republic, "Nova Cæsarea!" This ancient penny reminds us of the one a couple of thousand years older than the one used in the old dominion of Cæsar, which Christ took in his fingers and from which as a text he preached a sermon on loyalty to the government as well as loyalty to God. "Show me the tribute money. And they brought unto him a penny. And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? They say unto him, Cæsar's. Then saith he unto them, Render therefore unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's." (Matt. 22 : 19-21.)

Shark Kills Boy Bather

ON July 6 Charles Bruder, a bell-boy in a hotel in Spring Lake, N. J., was killed by a shark while bathing. His screams and struggles in the crimsoned water hastened the life guards to him. When they lifted him in the boat they found both of his legs gone, and he gasped, "A shark bit me," and then fainted. He died before they could get him to the hospital. This is the second case of the kind on the Jersey coast in a week. The other was at Beach Haven, where one leg was bitten off and the man died from loss of blood. There is this account of a man-eating fish in the Bible story where a tragedy was miraculously averted. "Now the Lord had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah." (Jonah 1 : 17.)

The Value of Religion

UNCLE HENRY FLOYD, who claims to be one hundred years old, a resident of Pulaski County, Ky., came into Somerset the other day looking hearty as a man of fifty. A reporter of the News of that city got him to talking and printed quite an interesting interview. He said he had made more whisky and drank less of it than any man in the county, but that a great change had come into his life when he joined the church and became a Christian. He says there is no real happiness out of Christ. "Uncle Henry" says he expects to live some years here and to enjoy an endless life beyond the tomb. He obeyed these words of the prophet: "Wash you, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings from before my eyes; cease to do evil, learn to do well." (Isa. 1 : 16, 17.)

A Strong Team

AT the fifty-fourth annual convention of the National Education Association in New York, William Jennings Bryan, in a powerful address that seemed to sweep the convention with enthusiasm, ridiculed the "preparedness" plank in both Republican and Democratic platforms, and insisted that the military spirit would do the school children more harm than good. Mr. Bryan thus magnified the office and ministry of the teacher: "You stand next to the nation's spiritual advisers in the importance of your work, the head being only second to the heart in the influence which it exerts on human destiny and happiness. The preacher and the teacher find a satisfaction in the consciousness of being helpful to others. It is a great privilege to be able to enter into the life of the young, to lead their thoughts into the right channels, to mold their opinions on vital questions and to impart to them the ideas which control their lives." The kinship of the work of the minister and teacher is thus referred to: "And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers." (Eph. 4 : 11.)

And the Deutschland herself with the tug Timmins

© International Film Service

THE day of the Undersea Fleet has arrived. There was more in the arrival at Baltimore on July 9 of the German submarine merchantman Deutschland than a temporary surprise for the enemies of Germany. That much is evidenced by the immediate filing of protests by the British and French embassies with the American State Department, as a result of which the State Department arranged for a most thorough inspection of the vessel by American naval experts. The inspection bore out the information as to the peaceful nature of the submarine, previously submitted to the Treasury Department by the collector of the port. The naval officers found that the Deutschland was not only unarmed but that she could not be armed without material changes in her structure. The world of commerce has a new carrier and the world of war has a new blockade-runner more elusive than the Irishman's flea. Being a merchantman the Deutschland, as an object of attack, must be stopped by a vessel of the fleet maintaining England's almost blockade of Germany, and her papers must be examined; but, granting that the Deutschland might not have seen her adversary in time to submerge before she was seen herself, while a boat was getting away from the captor the captive could quietly drop out of sight. There is safety beneath the wave and there is there as well an unobstructed trail. The submarine can even laugh at mine fields as it goes beneath them.

The idea of the submarine merchant fleet was conceived by Herr Albert Lohmann of Bremen, who convinced the officers of the Deutsche Bank and the North German Lloyd of the practicability of the scheme. The plans were formulated in the fall of 1915, the Ocean Navigation Company was incorporated and work was at once begun on several undersea liners. The Deutschland was the first vessel completed, and her sister ship, the Bremen, recently completed, will probably be the next arrival at an American port. The boats are 300 feet long, displace about 800 tons, ar hav a cargo capacity o bou 500 tons. Mexico's Supreme Problem

By HENRY ALLEN TUPPER

DR. TUPPER has visited Mexico fourteen times, studying its people and conditions, and has enjoyed special facilities for obtaining accurate information. This article was written immediately after his return from his latest visit, and reflects conditions as he saw them.]

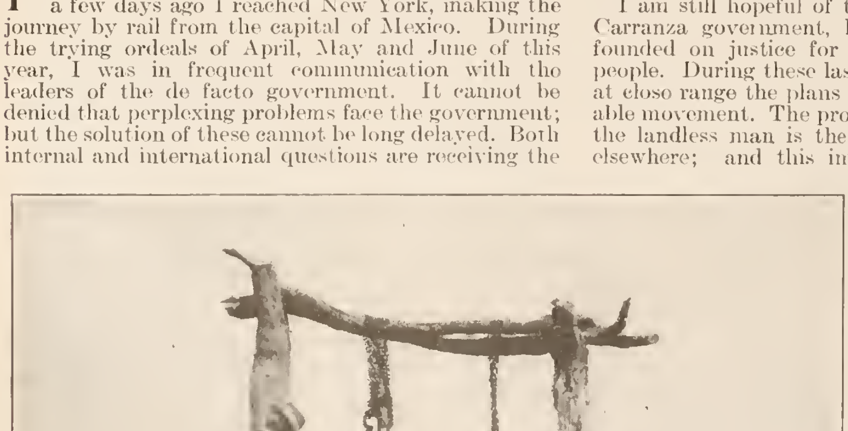
FOR three months I have been in Mexico City; and a few days ago I reached New York, making the journey by rail from the capital of Mexico. During the trying ordeals of April, May and June of this year, I was in frequent communication with the leaders of the de facto government. It cannot be denied that perplexing problems face the government; but the solution of these cannot be long delayed. Both internal and international questions are receiving the wise and just consideration of Carranza and his ministers; and slowly, but surely, they are advancing their government toward the desired goal.

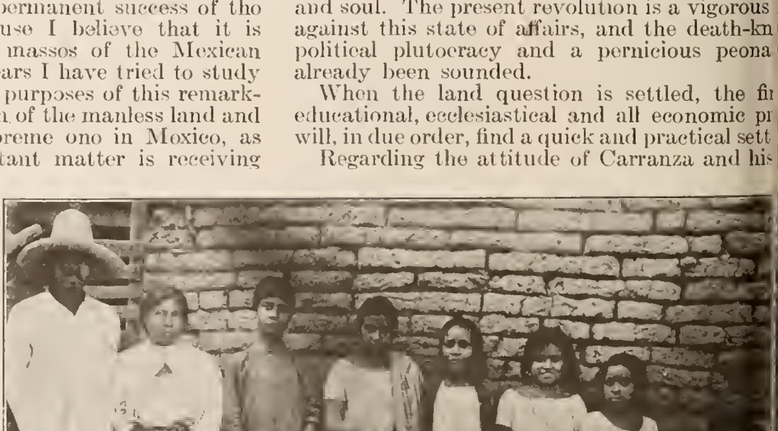
I am still hopeful of the permanent success of the Carranza government, because I believe that it is founded on justice for the masses of the Mexican people. During these last years I have tried to study at close range the plans and purposes of this remarkable movement. The problem of the manless land and the landless man is the supreme one in Mexico, as elsewhere; and this important matter is receiving the most careful attention the government. Millions of acres be ging to the Mexican people have bee aken from them, and the quasi titles thes lands are held by a comparati y few landlords in and out of Mexic Fo many years the peons have not only been rol ed o their birthright, but they have been held in b dag by a cruel slavery that is destructive of body min and soul. The present revolution is a vigorous otest against this state of affairs, and the death-kn of a political plutocracy and a pernicious peona has already been sounded.

When the land question is settled, the fi ncial educational, ecclesiastical and all economic pr lems will, in due order, find a quick and practical sett nent

Regarding the attitude of Carranza and his inis-



Bells of bondage. It is stated that these bells, used to keep evil spirits away, are found on the outskirts of some Mexican villages



A Rooseveltian peon and his family. Not a bad looking lot, either. Certai they deserve a fair chance to make a living ter toward the United States I think it ll to correct a popular misappre- e on. The psychology of the Latin rac is radically different from that of the Anglo-Saxon; and in passing judgme upon Mexican men and methods thi act must be kept in mind. Mexica are extremely sensitive; they are na ally suspicious, especially when the suspicions seemingly have a histo l basis; they have a keen national pri , and they possess patriotic sentime s which are easily awakened. The int national experiences of the Mexica have made it difficult for them to acc t, without substantial confirmation, the spirit and intent of an unselfish act n on the part of another nation—esp ially the nation that took from the stretches of rich territory less than se n decades ago.

I have had personal and repeated as ances from General Carranza himsel the members of his cabinet and ger als in his army that there is no an American feeling among them. If wa between the two republics were de red, I believe that the Mexicans, as whole, would unitedly resist inva n; but they do not want war; the know that this would be ruinous to heir country; and every evidence of raternal and peaceful relations be een the two governments is hailed wi joy, as was the case when President Wi n's friendly note was read in Me co City a few days ago.

Carranza is an educated man and appreciates the importance of good schools for his people. In 1915 and 1916, while in Vera Cruz and Mexico City, I had frequent talks with him and his associates on this question; and I was surprised to learn how much time and thought were being given to the preparation of an educational program to be introduced when the government was firmly established. A large number of young men and women, I was told, had been sent to the United States to prepare themselves to become teachers; and schools under governmental supervision were being established in different states of the republic. While the de facto government is opposed to the system of education that has been maintained by the Catholic Church, I have positive assurances that Carranza, heartily endorsed by his ministers, is in favor of the schools established and served by Protestant denominations, as these have, directly or indirectly, no political alliances. One of the fundamental doctrines of the revolution is the absolute separation of church and state; and the violation of this principle on the part of the Catholic Church is the cause of the opposition to that church and to the schools it has controlled.

The First Chief

While at Saltillo in 1914 I learned that the Madero Institute, a Protestant school for girls which had been established through the efforts of my father while he was at the head of the Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention, had been turned into a livery stable by the Huertistas, and that mules and horses were stalled in the rooms formerly filled with bright young Mexican women students. The fact was reported to the Constitutional general, the grounds and building were cleaned and repaired, and the institution was restored to its former mission, with the promise of future protection.

My convictions concerning intervention become stronger the more I study the proper relations that should exist between the United States and Mexico. Those who insist that we have provocation for such a war cannot maintain that we have any real justification for so drastic a measure. Those who are calling the loudest for war will not go near the firing-line; they are invincible in peace and invisible in war; and as a rule they desire to grind their axes without going near the grindstones. A war with Mexico would be senseless, useless, criminal—to crush a weakened and distracted neighbor republic.

The prospect of the restoration of order and the establishment of a stable government in Mexico is now more encouraging. Although much is yet to be accomplished, I am more hopeful on this subject now than I have been during any time in recent years. The material resources of the country are well-nigh limitless, the leaders of the people are addressing themselves to the practical solution of the problems that affect the nation, and a better international spirit pervades the republic. The First Chief has a stronger hold upon the popular heart, mind and conscience than at any previous time. The germ of national regeneration has been quickened and is manifesting itself in a program which includes the election of deputies, the meeting of Congress, the inauguration of a president, and the formal and final organization of a constitutional government.

That the Constitutionalist soldiers are now cooperating with ours to suppress the bandit element in Mexico cannot now be reasonably doubted. The extensive preparations on both sides of the Rio Grande foreshadow a cessation of lawless raids and depredations.

Giants Gathering Gold

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

YOU have all heard of the Klondike, the treasure cave of Jack Frost in this faraway land of the north, where gold dust and gra l and bowlders are cemented toget r by perpetual ice. You know of the housands who rushed here a few yea ago, and of the hundreds who we back loaded with gold. You may ha heard how the district has produ l gold by the ton, and how within te years after its discovery the outpu ooted up more than one hundred mi ons of dollars. That was the Klondi of the past. I write of the Klondi of today.

e first gold came from large pockets The icy earth was thawed down to d rock with wood fires, and the yel w grains dragged forth with pick an shovel and the sweat of man's br . It took rich dirt to pay for the lab , and when the cream had been ski med the individual miners left almo in a body. Then the new Klondike be n, which continues in the Klondike of day. Companies with millions of ca al brought in the latest of mining ma inery. They thawed the ice with ste n points, and forced electricity to dr ge the gold-bearing gravel from the depths of the earth and wash it to get out the gold. They turned the co se of rivers and carried them in pi s over the mountains to wash down th ills.

venty years ago there was no more be tiful valley on earth than that of the Klondike. It was bordered by gra -covered hills that rolled over one an her, rising here and there to far ab e the height of the Blue Ridge. Bo hills and valleys were covered wi woods. In the open spaces the gra reached to your knees or your wa , and there were wild flowers ev where. As soon as gold was disco red men began to chop down the tre . Lumber was worth $100 and upwa a thousand, and little pine logs br ght $3 each. The miners thawed th way down into the gravel, and de ed the landscape with piles of ha frozen muck. A little later the dr gers came in, and turned the land up le down. They stripped off the surfa of grass and stumps and plowed the beds of the creeks in great furro thirty feet deep, until they are no as bare and as dreary as any part of e Sahara. The two corporations w h have done most of this work are the Yukon Gold Company, commonly kn n as the Guggenheims, and Joseph W. Boyle, Ltd., or the Mining Company of the Canadian Klondike.

The excavation that has been done in the Klondike has been surpassed only by that of our great canal at Panama. The work is still going on. The Guggenheims have, on the famous gold creeks, nine dredges which are tearing nature to bits to get out the 60 cents' worth of gold still locked up in each ton of their rock and sand. They have a dozen hydraulic giants which are melting and gouging the hills to save the 10 or 20 cents of gold in each wagon load of the old White River Channel. At Juneau I saw them handling ore worth $1.50 to the ton, and it seemed wonderful that it could be done at a profit. Here they are taking out 20 cents' worth of gold to the ton, and the cost is so low that it pays. The amount of gold dust in each ton is as small as the pinch of snuff which your grandmother drew up her nose, and it is evenly mixed through as much sand as two horses can haul on a wagon. Still they can sluice down the sand so that every atom of that pinch of gold dust is saved.

I despair of making you appreciate the difficulties of mining in this icy land of the north. The winters are so cold that the Yukon Gold Company cannot work its machinery for more than seven months of the year. The most of the profits are made in the open season of 170 days, and then the work is shut down until next summer. In addition to the ice of the present is that of the far distant past. In other placer mining regions the earth and rock are free from frost. The gold is sprinkled through them and you have only to dig and wash to get the gold out. Here the whole country, with the exception of a foot or so at the surface, is one mass of ice mixed with boulders, pebbles and sand that has been perpetually frozen for thousands of years. Its condition dates back to the ice age of the prehistoric past. The ice goes down to no one knows where. They have sunk diamond drills in some places to a depth of 300 feet and found the earth frozen solid all the way through. The gravel is bedded in the ice, and the ice, sand and earth remain as hard as stone, no matter how hot the summer. The conglomerate or frozen mixture is covered by a thin bed of muck, on the top of which grows a layer of arctic moss, the two forming an insulator that preserves the frozen conditions beneath. It is only when the moss and muck are stripped off that the hot summer sun makes any impression on the glacial ice cap below.

It is sprinkled through this ice, earth and rock that the gold values lie. There is a little not far from the surface, but the most of the gold is at bedrock, which may be thirty, forty or fifty feet down. The frozen earth has to be thawed out, inch by inch, and foot by foot, in such a way that it can be swallowed by the dredges that gulp it down at the rate of twenty-six bites to the minute and about one-third of a ton to the bite. They take up the stuff in great buckets which run on an endless chain and throw it into revolving screens. These screens roll the rocks over and over and sift out the gold-bearing sand. They take away the pebbles and great boulders and turn the sand out upon plates covered with mercury which catches the gold. The dredges will handle something like 5,000,000 tons of material this year, and the amount of gold saved will be several millions of dollars.

Before any such work can be done Jack Frost must be taken out of the ground to be mined. The dredges cannot work in frozen rock, and the difficulties of the ice strata are far greater for them than they were for the individual miners. In the first mining of the Klondike the perpetual ice really aided the men by saving the trouble of timbering. They could dig down through it to where the great gold pockets lay, and then drift off along the bed rock, thawing only the strata that contained the most of the gold. The frozen earth was as firm as so much solid rock and they were able to work without the wooden supports necessary to hold up the roofs of the mines of other parts of the world.

The dredges have to have all the earth free from frost. The region they work must be thawed down to forty or fifty feet from the surface, and that in great blocks as big as a house, before the excavation can even begin.

THE methods of thawing the earth have been reduced to a science. The first miners used wood fires, which they kept burning until they had thawed a shaft down to the gold. Other fires were then built along the bed rock and the earth taken out until they had made great caverns and tunnels far down under the thirty or forty feet of ice overhead. They used hot stones to aid in the thawing and took out the melted material in wheelbarrows and carried it in buckets to the surface by windlasses like an old-fashioned well sweep.

The thawing of today is done by steam generated in great boilers on the top of the ground. The steam is carried through pipes to where needed, and forced into the earth through steel tubes three-fourths of an inch in diameter, and from ten to thirty feet long. These tubes are really galvanized iron pipe about as big around as my thumb, and stood upon end, the longest would reach to the roof of a three or four story house. Each tube has a hard metal cap or steel head on the top, and below this an opening where the connection with the main steam pipe is made. The bottom of the tube is pointed and the steel there is so strong that the tube can be driven down into the earth.

The driving is done with the tube standing upright on the ground. It is usually inside a derrick, which is often as tall as that of an oil well. A man stands on the derrick holding a sledge hammer weighing twelve pounds, and with this he drives the steam-carrying pipe inch by inch through the earth. The steam melts the ice as it goes down, and a second man stands at the surface and twists the pipe this way and that to aid in the work. After a long time bed rock is reached, and the tube is left there for two or three days oozing forth steam.

The tubes are so sunk that each softens the frozen earth for a radius of three or more feet around it, and these circles of melting six feet in diameter come together, making the whole of the ground so that it can be worked by the dredges. Hundreds of such pipes have to be sunk, and all are connected by other pipes with the steam-forcing plant. In places the pipes are so thick that they stand out on the back of old Mother Earth like the quills on a porcupine. They soften the earth so that it is dangerous to walk over it until it has cooled. The ground may seem solid, when all at once a man may drop to his knees or his waist in scalding hot mud.

AS we rode up the valleys I asked Mr. Chester A. Thomas, resident-manager of the Yukon Gold Company, whether they were able to win all the gold. He replied:

"We may lose a cent or two to the ton, but the amount is so small that we are unable to tell just what it is. The stuff that goes through the dredges may at times yield 60 cents a yard

Up to the present time more than $185,000,000 worth of gold has been taken out of the Klondike, and of that vast sum more than two-fifths has come from mining the low-grade earth with modern machinery. Mr. Thomas tells me that when he first came here to look into the country as a low grade proposition for the Guggenheim syndicate the crowd of fortune hunters had left and the few still at work were barely making day wages. They were scattered up and down the valley, and the Yukon Gold Company could have then bought the right to the whole of the Klondike for a very small sum. It confined its purchases only to the richest of the gold-bearing creeks. It was then thought that dredges could not handle the heavy quartz boulders found among the gravel, and, at first, stationary machines, consisting of with endless buckets, were empl dig up the earth and get out th Later the dredges were found t well, and after a time was evol strong dredge-type that is use today.

"All on a Summer's Day"

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

THE heat rose over the city in blinding, yellow-dusky waves of dryness. Sunshine, too hot to sparkle, poured into my room. Somewhere in the distance a typewriter—a myriad typewriters—pounded out a ceaseless, toneless chant.

A vagrant grasshopper, from heaven knows where, lost in the maze of high buildings and grassless streets, paused disconsolately on my window-sill, before he dropped hopelessly into space. I watched him go, and then with a sigh I walked slowly to the window and looked down at the street that lay five stories below. Thronged with people was the street, for my office overlooks a corner that marks the insistent approach of the East Side slums. And no matter how warm the day may be, the slums are never still. Always one can see a turgid stream of people moving—sluggishly, perhaps, but still moving.

WITH fingers nearly mechanical I reached for my hat and pulled its broad brim well over my eyes. The street was warm and sordid-looking, but it was alive and vital. The walls of my office were just dead plaster, and the drone of the typewriters was too dull to mean anything. Rather hopelessly, like the lost grasshopper, I left my office and plunged into the warmth of the streets.

Once there, I was rather sorry that I had allowed anything to entice me away from the electric fan, and the comparative, though monotonous, quietness of my four office walls. Noise, on a coldly biting winter day, is invigorating. Noise, on a warm summer day, is withering. And the streets, five stories below my office, were more than noisy. There was the clang of a fire-engine, and the wheezy music of a little band, and the rattle of an elevated railroad, and the dull growl of the subway. There was the minor bang of a hokey-pokey wagon, rattling over cobblestones, and the blended wails of many tired children, and above and under and around all of it there was the ceaseless tramp, tramp of weary feet. I appealed to a well-dressed woman who was standing on the corner wai a car. "It's warm, isn't it?" tioned, "and noisy. Doesn't it tir

In a Department Store

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

I SAW a shopgirl bid good-by
To a boy in a khaki coat;
She smiled at him though her eyes were dim,
And sobs rose up in her throat.
His face was hopeful, and glad and strong,
And eager beyond belief;
But behind her smile I could see a soul
That was shattered and torn with grief.

I saw a shopgirl bid good-by
To a boy who was off to war;
The love-light gleamed from her eyes and seemed
To sweeten the whole great store.
Folk turned away as she raised her head,
As her hand on his arm was laid;
For behind the light in her tender eyes,
Was a soul that sobbed—and prayed.

I saw a shopgirl bid good-by
To a boy who had heard the call
Of honor, and land, and deeds that stand
For a nation over all.
His thoughts were out in the open fight. . . .
But, oh, as she watched him go,
Her clasped hands fell on the counter there,
And her face was stark with woe.

t's so warm now," I ventured, "t I guess you'd like to go in again, w dn't you?"

ou bet I would," the child exla ied; "but"—and her voice became stu edly cheerful—"but I don't mind th summer so much, 'cause I kin re mber, a little, how it was. e girl bit her lips to steady them. Bu when she answered, her voice was ste ily calm.

es, it is warm," she said. And th quite suddenly, she gave a little half sob. "I wonder if it's much hotter in Mexico?" she asked me.

OUT on the street again I walked rather aimlessly. The girl's stricken face was in my mind, and I wondered if every girl who had sent a brother or a lover or a husband off to the front had looked as she looked. I saw an officer in khaki whirr past in a low racing car, and turned sharply from the street and its vague glimpse of war. My turn brought me up abruptly against the Business Man's blue serge shoulder. His hat was off as I murmured a combined apology and greeting.

"Whither away, in such a hurry?" he questioned genially. "It's too warm to hurry!"

"It's too warm for—anything," I told him rather breathlessly. "Aren't you almost—dead—from—the—heat?"

"Dead nothing!" exclaimed the Business Man. "Why, I'm happy enough to sing. I'm going back to the farm for a vacation where I lived when a boy!

"It seems just as if it was all yesterday. How I walked over the fields where the hay had just been cut—and how the stubble scratched my bare brown feet! How I swam in the deep hole under the willows! How I ate home-made blueberry tarts, and biscuits, and honey; and how I fell into a bed, of nights, I was so tired!" The Business Man laughed, a strangely boyish laugh, as he glanced at his watch.

"Well," he told me, "I've got a train to catch, I have!" He laughed again, joyously, as he shook my hand.

"What's heat," he questioned, "when you're going home!"

AND so, all on a summer's day, I learned four lessons—lessons from a brisk stranger-woman, and a lean little girl, and a tired clerk in a department store, and an efficient business man.

And as I hurried back to my office a faint breeze softly touched my cheek—the first breeze that I had felt in days. And I knew that the heat had broken.

Dr. Havens Emerson, Commissioner of Health for New York City, who is at the forefront of the fight against the epidemic of infantile paralysis

A the daily reports of the ealth department of Ne York City showed a ste y increase in new cases of antile paralysis and in th death rate, physicians an nurses and hospitals an indred institutions volun red their services in th campaign against the ins ous enemy. The Federa overnment also hurried to rescue, and placed at the services of the New Yo authorities the hospit facilities of Ellis Island. Co ress was asked by Secretary McAdoo to propriate $135,000 for the use of the Pu c Health Service in stamping out the dis se, and in preventing its spread throughou e country.

menace was so acute that a general cle -up of New York was at once begun. The cit ourts were glutted with offenders against th nitary rules, who were fined in every case. Th Home Defense League, which is composed of useholders, actively aided the health an police departments in running down ve rs of unwholesome foodstuffs and vic ors of the sanitary laws Twenty or thi thousand men and women are enrolled in s hygienic army.

anwhile physicians, together with expe from the Federal government, began th ugh investigations into the origin, nature, cu and prevention of this mysterious malady. Ch employees gave up their vacations in order to engage in this good fight. Cooperative methods for fighting the disease were arranged by the New York authorities with suburban towns and the railroads and ferries that take care of the tremendous passenger traffic in and about New York. The New York State Department of Health began a state-wide series of lectures by experts to inform the public as far as possible upon what to do to protect their children. Cases of the disease were reported in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania Ohio, Louisiana and Tennessee, besides New York and New Jersey.

The authorities seem to regard the widespread precautions they have taken as certain to overcome the epidemic before it has claimed very many more little children. Even ordinarily the disease is by no means as rapid in its spread as such a disease as the measles, which just shortly before the appearance of the infantile paralysis cases had visited this section of the country and closed up the schools all about. In fact, just how rapidly it might spread if it got a thoroughly good start is not known.

Since, in the opinion of Dr. Flexner, good health seems to be no protection against the disease, it would be out of the question to argue from the present alarming experience that the safeguard against epidemics lies in compulsory physical examination and medical attention under the supervision of state and municipal health boards. So far as the information warrants any definite deductions, they would seem to be in the direction of more effective performance of their duties by those municipal officers who have in charge the regulation of the display and sale of uncooked foods and the collection and disposal of garbage and waste.

And what is true of New York and Brooklyn is true in kind, if not in the same degree, of most towns. And the rebuke for bad conditions lies upon a too easy-going public that sees and endures without protest until little babies begin to have convulsions stiffen out and die, or, worse yet, live deformed, defective, pitiable objects for many years, victims not so much of an epidemic as of official condonement of selfish indifference by individuals to the public's rights.

Why Cars Go Wrong

There is another side to efficiency, as practiced in the Mitchell by John W. Bate. It is the avoidance of errors, of flaws and shortcomings.

Some buyers in all makes seem to get lucky cars. Other cars of the same make seem "unlucky."

One great problem in efficiency is to make that variance impossible. To make each a perfect car. And this is how Mr. Bate does it.

An Army of Inspectors

The materials we buy are made to our formulas. When they arrive they are analyzed, to prove their accord with the formula.

Men in this factory are trained in one operation. They become proficient in it. But an army of inspectors are employed to guard every part against error.

Our margins of safety are set at 50 per cent. That is, every vital part must be one-half stronger than necessary. And we make tests to prove it so.

Our engines are tested separately. Then put in the chassis and tested again — tested in radical ways. Then we have our own speedway on which finished cars are tested.

Every Mitchell car has to pass in the making hundreds of tests and inspections. And every car, before it leaves our factory, proves itself a perfect car.

John W. Bate is Safe

You can rely on a car built by John W. Bate, the efficiency engineer. The whole Mitchell factory was built and equipped by him.

His methods have cut our costs 50 per cent. You can see the result in the Mitchell value. You can see it also in the 26 extra features which other cars omit.

The Mid-Year Mitchell — the model just out—is the 17th model built under his direction. It shows the effect of 700 improvements he has made in the Mitchell car.

The car is almost without castings. There are 440 parts which are either drop forged or steel stamped. The result shows in Mitchell records. Six of these cars have averaged 164,372 miles each, or over 30 years of ordinary service.

It equally excels in beauty and equipment. This Mid-Year model brings out 73 new ideas. It combines all the best new touches found in 257 models exhibited at the latest shows. It has in addition 26 extra features, all of which you will want.

This Mid-Year Mitchell is the last word in efficiency. Go see what it means to you.

Announcement

Beginning our fifth successful season, we announce the continuation, without change, of the popular Model 37, $795. The price will not be lowered, but it may have to be raised if the cost of materials continues to rise.

Brought out a year ago, Model 37 gripped the motoring public instantly. Our contemplated production was first doubled—then tripled during the year.

For 1917 we plan to build and deliver 15,000 of this model. Even then many orders will go unfilled.

In cars priced under $1000, the Allen is unsurpassed.

This positive statement expressed by a reputable company, and endorsed as it is by thousands of Allen owners and dealers, is worth your serious consideration.

If you contemplate buying a car under $1,000, we ask only a careful comparison of the Allen with others in its class, for it is such comparison that has so rapidly established Allen popularity.

The Greatest Thing in the Worl

International Sunday School Lesson for August 6. I Co 13

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"Now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; and the greatest of these is love." I Cor. 13:

Faith will abide in exercise in the life on the other side, because we shall continue in that life also to rely on the word of our God, that our sins shall be remembered no more, and that his love will never let us go. Hope also will abide in exercise, because we shall ever be pressing on to new and happier experiences, to fresh and more glorious discoveries. We are told that our Lord, the Lamb that sitteth on the throne, shall not only dwell among us, but shall lead us to living fountains of waters, as though we shall come on fairer pastures and to more delightful wells, when we advance under his guidance to deeper experiences of God. Love will also abide in exercise. The dying saint put it rather bluntly to his weeping wife, who feared that they would not recognize each other in the next life. "Mary," he said, "we shall not be more foolish w n we get over there, but wiser, and we s ll know each other at the first glance." I e is part of ourselves and the most sa d part. It is engrained in us like a fast e. Intellect may fade and dim, as the y s pass, but the love of the heart will al only bursting into quicker flame, like s e hidden fire that only waits for the brea g of the coal. We are only learning the m syllables of love here; there we shall s k its full language; but the early babbl s are the foundation of what will fol . Only let us see to it that our friends s and affinities in this life are of such a na e that we may be ready to meet their har st when we enter on the summer-time of r existence. Above all, the love of Jesus a e have known it here will be ours for e r.

Love and Prohibition

By Arthur H. Howland

SOME newspaper readers remember even yet an incident of a Staten Island court-room which occurred about fifteen years ago. A man whose name was Goode was being sentenced to state prison. In passing sentence the judge said: "Your name is Goode, but it ought to be Bad," and then proceeded to give the prisoner a tongue-lashing such as is rarely heard in a court-room. For this man was not only bad, thus belying the beautiful name with which he had been born, but his badness was of a peculiarly despicable character. It has often been said that there is honor even among thieves, but even among the crooks of New York this man was considered too crooked to be tolerated. He was yellow, mean, thoroughly and desperately bad.

But now this same man is one of the most faithful and efficient Christian workers in New York City. He has entered into the inheritance of his beautiful name. Some of his companions think that he is not only good, but best; and one friend particularly speaks of him as the best Christian he knows.

What changed John Goode from the worst of the bad to the best of the good? If the answer had to be limited to one item, one single object, it would be the Thirteenth Chapter of First Corinthians. For six months the Bible class of the Bowery Mission Brotherhood studied that wonderful chapter under the leadership of Dr. Hallimond, and John Goode, who with all his contact with the world had never realized that there was such a thing as love, was changed from a sinner into a saint.

Professor Drummond was not guilty of exaggeration in calling love The Greatest Thing in the World. It is the basis, the atmosphere, the method, the power of all goodness.

The Thirteenth Chapter of First Corinthians brought to the world what was really a new word. Of course the word love was in the ancient languages, but it never meant to the ancient pagan or even to the Jew what it means to the Christian. Love, as the ancient poets used it, meant often a very cruel sort of selfishness, a selfishness that would sacrifice to its desire the virtue, the welfare, the happiness of another. They used the word love in much the same childish sense that children use it when they speak of loving something that they like to eat. The pagan idea of love was the desire to possess and enjoy, which became often the desire to destroy and devour. But the love of parent for child, of child for parent, of friend for friend, of husband for wife, was even in those days a real and beautiful thing. The Jews added to that idea of human love the thought of love and loyalty to God. But Christian love means a love for others that grows out of our love for Christ; or perhaps we should say a love for Christ that expresses itself in ardent, happy, self-sacrificing love for others. And there is always in the highest idea of Christian love the thought of the cross of Christ. People who really believe that Jesus died for them ha necessarily a deeper, more vital, m intense love for him than those coul have who do not. That is in all their t ight and feeling about him: "He d for me." And because he died for t n he is dear to them.

This is how that old word "cl ity" crept into this chapter in the King James version, instead of love. High school Latin pupils will recognize this word charity "caritas." Caritas ally means the feeling one has when a ther is dear to him (carus). So Christi love is a feeling, or emotion, that o has when Christ is dear to him; an dear to him because he manifested h own love by suffering and death. Th because of that dearness of Christ, l ause the Christian really loves hi and wishes to please him, and l ause Christ died for all, the Christia feel that all people are dear, are precio : he loves all, and tries to help all.

Paul sums this up in a beautif passage in Second Corinthians, apter 5: 14-15: "For the love of Chri constraineth us; because we thus dge, that if one died for all, then w e all dead; and that he died for all, th they who live should not henceforth li unto themselves, but unto him who c l for them and rose again."

It is this kind of love, Christia love, love that springs up in the heart hose whom Jesus has redeemed, that i going to change and save this bad wo just as it saved that man John Goo and made him even better than his n e.

The particular application to b nade this week on the lesson of love i the problem of intemperance. Lo will surely settle every phase of that p lem. A man will not drink, because he ishes his body and brain to be at th bes for the sake of the Christ he lo an the work he is trying to do for hers certainly a man who loves Chr an really loves his neighbors will not manufacture or sell a thing which will oison and destroy them; a man wh love Christ and his neighbor will not n th application for license that dest ctive poison may be sold, or vote that ense be issued. On the other hand wi work to the utmost by vote an voice and example to prevent the sale d us of this life-destroyer. Christian l e ha power to cure and save the drunk d, t convert the saloon-keeper, to ma bot lawmakers and voters brave an righ soundness or even of his life rather than compel him to celebrate the Fourth like a mollyeoddle. But sanity and love gained ground. Parents found that they did not like, after all, the idea of having their boys' fingers blown off or their eyes blown out, or to have them die in the horrors of lockjaw. At last the idea of the Safe and Sane Fourth triumphed, and even in New York City on the Independence Day just passed fireworks and firecrackers were almost unknown. The impossible was achieved. The boys were saved. Merchants were not allowed to sell the thing that would produce harm and death.

A few years ago it would ha bee thought impossible for the bigge citie of America to celebrate the Fo h o July without firecrackers and ot r explosive fireworks. But a few rnes persons, writers, reformers, pul shers began a crusade against their sal Yea after year they kept banging aw at it telling the hideous story of the ss o life and limb and eyesight, and t dangers of the insane method of cel atin Independence Day. They were erie as fanatics. They were told t t th American boy was so fond of gun wde and noise, and had grown so d expressing his patriotism in th way that any other kind of Fourth Jul celebration was preposterous and npos sible. Many parents felt they oul rather take the risk of their boy

And this is what is happening to the liquor business. Because it is a bad business, because it hurts and defiles, kills and destroys lives and souls, it is being rapidly driven out of our nation and out of the civilized world. A great secular American weekly is devoting the same spot of its double page editorial department to an attack on booze every single week. Readers of that paper know that on that particular spot they will find a bull's-eye shot every week at the liquor business. This is but one of the many signs of the times. The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor has been working under a skilful prohibition leader, taking as their slogan "A Saloonless Nation by 1920."

A few years ago the citizens of Foochow, China, living in the darkness of heathenism, rose in fury and closed all the opium establishments of the city, destroying all the opium found, together with all the apparatus for using it. A great bonfire was made and the city was set free from the curse under which it had so long suffered.

If Foochow can do that with opium and New York can do that with fireworks, why cannot all the cities and counties of America extinguish and exterminate and annihilate the saloon?

The Consecration of Friendship

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Eccl. 4 : 9, 10 (Consecration Meeting)

WE have studied, and it is to be hoped made this year, a consecration of Influence, of Strength, of Time, of Talent, of Money, of Purpose. If we have consecrated all these to the cause of Christ it will not be difficult or puzzling to give him absolute sway in the matter of our friendships.

This does not mean that we must be talking religion all the time to our friends, or that we must have no friends who are not religious. It does not mean that we are to be priggish, disagreeable people. It means that we shall try to be, so far as we can, the kind of a friend that Jesus was, and choose our friendships and our companionships and make our appointments and plans as he chose and made his.

If there was ever a genial, happy, gladsome friend it was Jesus. And the people who have been most like him have been princes in the world of friendship. Find something about the friendships of Henry Drummond. You will get beautiful glimpses of his life as a friend in the biography of him, written by one of his best friends, Professor George Adam Smith. Charles Kingsley was a charming friend. So was Phillips Brooks. Many social groups of philosophers, artists, writers have been glad to include in their number some earnest minister, chaplain, bishop or priest, who brought the flavor and the fragrance of real piety and the value of a real knowledge of divine things to their discussions and good fellowship.

To consecrate the friendships of our life means first of all that Christ shall be our first friend and our best. We hear him say to us: "Henceforth I call you not servants, but I have called you friends." And we will enter into no companionship or take part in no recreation or pastime where we can not be gladly conscious of his presence and upon which we can not honestly ask his blessing.

Choose friends that will help you most, encouraging you to the highest ideals and noblest living, the best wisdom and the most successful work. Then be to all others who choose your friendship just that kind of a friend.

Ask some one to study up incidents from the friendships of saintly people. Have some one read selections from Hugh Black's "Friendship" and Tennyson's "In Memoriam."

The Taming of the Tongue

Epworth League. Job 5 : 21; Prov. 21 : 23; James 1 : 26; 3 : 6-10; II Tim. 2 : 24-25.

THE heart of the matter of the unruly tongue is reached in the wonderful passage in James given as one of our references. The passage should begin at the first verse of the third chapter and extend to the tenth verse of the fourth. The apostle complains: "Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing"; and he urges: "My brethren, these things ought not so to be." He traces the trouble down to its source and finds the difficulty in the heart, a heart in which both hate and love are trying to exist side by side. And this is his remedy: "More grace" (4 : 6), or, as the margin puts it, "a greater grace" (see American Revision). What is needed is a new blessing of divine love that shall take all hate and unkindness out of the soul. James makes his advice more specific, showing how this blessing may be received: "Submit yourselves therefore to God." "Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you. Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye double-minded." "Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and he shall lift you up."

So the way to have a kind, pure tongue is to have a kind, pure heart. With this kind of a heart only well-chosen, helpful words will be spoken. This does not mean that sin and sinners shall not be vigorously rebuked, and the terms used in rebuking them will vary with the temperament of the speaker and the times in which he lives. One whose heart is filled with love and whose life is bent on a career of helpfulness cannot tolerate the interference and hindering of bad-hearted people, and he will often be stern and strong in attacking and denouncing them.

But after all, the lesson of everyday courtesy, gentleness and kind-speaking, in home circles and work circles and school circles, is a lesson we must all earnestly strive to master. A loving heart, a gentle spirit, a trained, refined sense of courtesy will solve the problem of the restless tongue.

Littul Fella's Arms

By
W. Livingston Larned

I NEVER realized, till now,
How much his loving meant to me.
Those warm, plump arms around my neck
Have brought it back again, you see.
Just now, while rocking in the dark,
I heard a soft step on the stair,
And, while I could not see my boy,
I knew that he was standing there.

Then quickly, in a firm embrace,
He threw his arms about my neck—
A savage little burst of love
I did not have the heart to check.
He hugged until his tiny strength
Gave out, and then I captured him;
A hug in turn, of equal length,
Whilst both the eyes of me were dim.

It was the suddenness of it:
Spontaneous—that made me think.
Like some young doe beside a stream
He ran, at Nature's call, to drink.
I thrilled at being loved so much;
I murmured out a fitful prayer;
And God was in each finger-touch,
The feeling of them was so fair.

Yes, Love was brooding in the heart
When arms encircled, for a spell,
And—maybe—we have lived apart—
The kid and Daddy Jim—and, well,
I only know those baby arms
Brought back the joy of having him;
Brought back a duty and a love,
Whilst both the eyes of me are dim.

Wash Day Glooms are Banished

Apologies to T. E. Powers

When you use Fels-Naptha Soap—especially when you use it the Fels-Naptha way—with cool or lukewarm water.

Don't take our word for it, but put our promise of the easier, better, quicker way of washing to the test—to-day, any day—and "Joy" will drive "Gloom" away.

For instance—next washday, put your clothes to soak with Fels-Naptha. The Red and Green wrapper will tell you just how to do it. Let them soak while you're getting some of your regular work done—then come back to wash! You'll find there's almost nothing for you to do—just a few light rubs and then you're ready to rinse the dirt away.

And that's only one thing. Fels-Naptha does every household soap-and-water task easily, quickly and thoroughly as it does the weekly wash.

Fels-Naptha is the perfect combination of good soap with naptha. It seeks out every particle of dirt and grease and dissolves it, without harm to finest fabric, most delicate colors, or tenderest skin.

Grape-Nuts

embodies the full, rich nutriment of whole wheat combined with malted barley. This combination gives it a distinctive, delicious flavor unknown to foods made from wheat alone.

Only selected grain is used in making Grape-Nuts, and through skillful processing it comes from the package fresh, crisp, untouched by hand, and ready to eat.

Through long baking, the energy producing starches of the grain are made wonderfully easy of digestion.

A daily ration of this splendid food yields a marvelous return of health and comfort.

The Christian Herald Prayer Leagu

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League. All correspondents are specially requested to make their letters as brief as possible. Write requests and acknowledgments on separate sheets.

A MOTHER writes from Oxford, Ala.: "Only a short time elapsed before my son returned home, after requesting the prayers of the Prayer League that he might be saved and return home. I thank God and every member of the Prayer League."

A Reader writes from Mercer, Pa., to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayers that the epidemic of diphtheria in that town be checked without further deaths; no new cases nor deaths were reported after the request was sent in.

A prisoner from Baltimore, Md., writes: "Since Jesus came into my heart and since I became a member of the Prayer League many prayers have been answered for me. About six months ago I requested prayers of the League asking that a great obstacle might be removed. Within the past few months in direct answer to prayer God has raised up some very good friends who are interested in my future welfare."

A Sister writes from Warren, Ill.: "Two months ago I was called to the bedside of a sick sister. Her left hand was dislocated and she was also very ill with pneumonia. The doctors said she would die. A day and night passed of watching, and I went to my room thoroughly exhausted. I fell on my knees and asked the Lord to save my sister's life. When I arose I wrote to the Christian Herald Prayer League for their prayers. Anxious days passed, and one day at noon the struggle came. All thought she was dying. She lay perfectly motionless. But she breathed —and she lived. In the following days she gradually regained her health. Her hand now is so well that she can play the piano. No physician can understand how she got well, but she lives, thank the Lord, and our hearts are filled with gratitude to our heavenly Father."

Mrs. E. W. writes from Johnstown, Pa.: "I want to thank God and the Prayer League. Our little boy, who was very low with pneumonia, is on the road to recovery. By prayer and faith God spared him to us. My cousin came and stayed two nights and helped nurse him. She is a good Christian, and now her little son, who is thirteen, has scarlet fever and diphtheria and is very low. I ask the prayers of the League that God may spare him to her."

E. K. writes: "I asked the prayers of the League to help me get released from an insane asylum, and now that the prayer has been answered I want to thank the members of the League for their kindness in praying for me. Please pray that I may get stronger physically and mentally, so that I may never have to go back to the hospital again."

Mrs. E. H. H. writes: "Some timo ago I wrote asking you to pray for my daughter, and I am writing now to tell you she is almost well and to ask you to pray for my son that he may be healed of the drink and drug habit. Also that he may love his wife and treat her kindly. They are on the verge of a separation, and have three children. Pray with me that his heart may be changed and their home saved for the babies' sake. I want, too, to ask your prayers for myself. I have a very bad cough and have been losing strength all spring and summer."

M. R. S. writes from Redfield, N. Y.: "I sent you a request asking for prayer for the little girl, my son's adopted daughter, who was injured by a fox. We had taken her to seven different doctors and received no help. She could not take one step and had to be carried from place to place. Now she goes to school every day. Is a little lame, but gradually getting better. I praise and thank the Lord and the Prayer League nak er first appearance. It was known that Ba more tug, the Timmins, had been cruising side the Virginia Capes in wait for a ow. hich rumor said was the German craft. The mmins had given up and had gone up he y when the Deutschland appeared off he c es at 1:45 A.M. Sunday. The Deutsch- and ruised about apparently waiting for ler nvoy until 4 A.M., when she entered Che eake Bay and asked for a pilot. She hen oceeded up the bay until she was met y Timmins, which had heard of her rriv and had hurried out to meet her. She vas cked at Baltimore, but every precau- ion ıs taken to prevent unauthorized per- ons om getting aboard. As soon as the ffic inspections were completed stevedores ven o work to unload the cargo. Captain Koe said that he would sail for home as soon s h ecured a return cargo. It is expected hat monthly service will be maintained.

Tl trip of the Deutschland is not a record rip cept in its bearing on commercial prob- ms The German submarine U-51 made the rip m Wilhelmshaven to the Dardanelles, ver 000 miles, and was later followed by the J boats. In October, 1915, four sub- nari s of the United States navy made the 10 nile trip from San Francisco to Hono- lu ıder convoy of other vessels, and in une 915, ten British submarines made the rip om Quebec to England, also under onv. The German submarine which made he n from Pola, Austria, to Cartagena, pai n June, covered 1,500 miles unattended.

Ju what effect the establishment of a egu submarine merchant service between me an and German ports would have on he called Allied blockade or upon the con- uct the war at sea it is impossible to fore- ast. The London Daily News reports Eng- sh icial opinion to be that under existing ircu stances a submarine cannot be classed s a erchant vessel at all, and it sees the me an government facing "a new and del- cate roblem which adds one more to the lrea numerous points on which a decision fte e war will be imperative." The Ger- nan ress are frankly enthusiastic over the acc of the initial venture. The American res eem willing to leave the international spe of the case to the government, while nit in praise of the genius and skill that ad he trip possible. The New York Times alls e trip of the Deutschland "an incident whic ompels admiration and stirs the imag- ati ," while the Herald, whose editor lives n P s, says of it that it was "brilliant in onc tion and successful in conduct, . . . n a ievement that will assign to this sub- nari a high place in the annals of worthy a enture." The Herald says also, "How iffe it would have been sentiment in this our y if Germany had used Deutschlands nste of torpedoes when she first attempted o b k the British blockade!" The New Yor Tribune says, "The arrival of the Deu hland at Baltimore means a triumph for Ger n genius unlike any other yet recorded n h ory," and it says as well, "The notion hat [the Deutschland's feat] 'proves that he glish blockade amounts to nothing' is elu nal, as the Germans themselves are vell are."

It as expected at this writing that the Deu hland would have discharged her cargo f d stuffs and have taken aboard her return arg f nickel and rubber in time to clear for er ne port by Sunday, July 23, or the day ollo ng. Three Allied cruisers were reported s c ising off the Virginia Capes in watch or outward bound Deutschland, but as he tance between the capes is fifteen miles, vit mple areas of deep water within the hre nile limit, Captain Koenig did not fear ny tempt to capture his ship. It was sug- est that, since to make it public at once nig be giving aid and comfort to Germany's ner s, the American port authorities might ot nounce the clearing of the Deutschland nti he had had time to get well under way Var s persons, mostly Americans, have offer large sums for passage to Germany abo the Deutschland, but the agents of he ssel state that no passengers will be arr : it is even possible that no mails, ex- ept he official embassy mail, will be carried.

Ira Vail Won $2000

In the Metropolitan Race at Sheepshead Bay with a Used Hudson Super-Six

The Only Car That Kept Going

Here s another example of the wondrous endurance of the Hudson Super-Six.

That is what we are proving in this patented motor. Our speed tests are all reliability tests. The miles per hour don't matter.

17 Race Cars Meet

At Sheepshead Bay on May 13, the finest race cars in the world met in competition.

It was the year's great event—the Metropolitan Race. Europe sent her best productions for it. America met them with the best she builds.

It was not a stock-car rivalry. These were racing models, built for speed alone, regardless of road service.

Ira Vail wanted to drive in that race, but all the racing cars were taken.

So he thought of the Hudson Super-Six. In speed and endurance it had broken all stock-car records. "Could it be possible," he asked himself, "for the Super-Six to out-match racing cars?"

Bought a Used Car

That was on Monday. The race was on Saturday. And no new Super-Six was available. So he induced our Brooklyn dealer to sell his demonstrating car.

It was, of course, a stock Hudson Super-Six. It had been used in 200 demonstrations. Ira Vail got it for $1300. The cars against him probably averaged $10,000 apiece.

He cut out 22 inches of frame to bring it to racing length. He put racing gears in the axle and mounted a racing body. That was all. The motor was identical with all Hudson Super-Sixes.

With that modified Hudson he won third place against all those racing thoroughbreds. And his prize was $2000.

Not a Single Stop

A stock Super-Six, in a sheer speed test, could not hope to compete with big powerful motors built for racing only.

But the race covered 150 miles, and every other car had to stop. Not a car on the track, save the Super-Six could cover that distance at top speed without some repairs or adjustments.

So the Super-Six beat all but two of the cars—the world's finest racing models—simply because of endurance. Its speed was 91 miles per hour.

1819 Miles in 24 Hours

In our Super-Six—the Hudson's patented motor—we are not after speed records.

The records show that the Super-Six outspeeds all other stock cars. But our object is to prove the motor's matchless endurance.

A stock Super-Six chassis was driven 1819 miles in 24 hours, at an average speed of 75.8 miles per hour. That is the distance from New York to Denver. It excelled by 52 per cent the best previous record for a stock car in 24 hours.

The same car had been previously driven 2000 miles at an average speed exceeding 80 miles per hour. At the end of those tests—nearly 4000 miles at top speed—the Super-Six motor showed no appreciable wear.

50 Miles in One

It is estimated by experts that one mile at such speed equals 50 miles of ordinary driving. If that is so, those 4000 miles meant as much in motor wear and strain as 200,000 miles as you drive.

Anyway, the Super-Six has shown endurance which is seemingly impossible. No other car has ever approached it. And a year ago not an engineer living believed that such things could be done.

Keep watch of these Hudson records. We shall keep you informed. They are proving the Super-Six again and again the greatest car in the world.

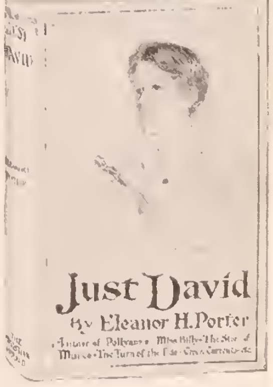
"JUST DAVID"

By Eleanor H. Porter

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.



We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new eight-months' subscription accompanied by $1.00. Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year and send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, for $2.00.

"LITTLE SIR GALAHAD"

We do not know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story that it appeals to the reader probably with greater force than if the action were on a more dignified level.

It is as good a story as we have encountered in many a day, and that's saying a good deal.

We will send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, to any present subscriber, as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription accompanied by $1.50. Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for one year, and send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad," for $2.00

If more buyers knew the joy and satisfaction of driving a good hill climber like the Haynes—there'd be fewer satisfied owners of cars that are weak in hill climbing ability.

In a Haynes you can climb hills with turns so sharp that the car has to be slowed down, and yet make it on high gear.

In sections of the country where the hills are the most trying, the Haynes is met with more frequently than any car of its class.

In addition to its reserve power which levels the hills and makes it master of the whole road, the Haynes has amazing flexibility, surprising get-away ability, and is very economical in upkeep.

See this wonderful car at your dealer's—ride in it—see how it takes the hills and delivers power in abundance to the rear wheels. Compare its performance with other cars you may be considering, and it will win the verdict by a big margin.

Bible Picture Contest

A CORPS of selected assistants has been steadily at work since the morning of the 18th of July, on the sets of answers sent in by participants in the Bible Picture Contest, tabulating the different Bible verses submitted for each picture. As soon as this task is completed, all these various answers (some pictures have more than a score of answers so far) will be submitted to the Committee of Judges; and the Judges will decide, in the case of each picture, which of the submitted Bible verses manifest the greatest applicability.

We shall publish such "best" answers. The contestants who have submitted these winning answers, or any of them, will receive credit accordingly.

In the meanwhile, we request that all who took part in the Contest realize the magnitude of the work before us and consequently exercise patience. We shall not respond in person to inquiries as to when the judging will be over, when the rewards will be awarded, and so forth. All news will be given in the Christian Herald.

Do not write to the Judges, as they can not answer you. All information will be published by us. The Committee is extremely obliging in undertaking the judging of answers, and that is all they should be asked to do. We are grateful to them, and we are sure you are, also.

You can rest assured that merit alone will win, when you consider the capacity and eminence of our Judges.

Merry Moments

A WITTY COLONIAL DAME. The women of the olden days in our country were not lacking in mother wit. A host who was carving a pig at a dinner more than a hundred years ago took a rib of the pig and, holding it up before the ladies, said, "Ladies, I believe that this is what the first of your sex was made of."

"Yes, it was," calmly replied one of the ladies, "and from very much the same kind of a critter."

DIDN'T HAVE ANY USE FOR IT. An old church member came in one morning just as the pastor was taking a collection to buy a much needed chandelier.

"Well, Brother B—," said the preacher, addressing the old man who had just come in, "how much will you put in to help buy the chandelier?"

"Not a cent will I waste in such a manner," replied the old gentleman. "If you all needed it things might be different, but I dare say if we had had one there's not a young lady in town could play on it."

MORE LITERAL THAN LITERARY. A lady was entertaining her daughter's caller, who was just back from a summer outing. The conversation had been somewhat spasmodic, and finally she decided to try him on some of the new books:

"Have you read 'Freckles,' Mr. Johnson?" she ventured.

"No, ma'am," he stammered blushing, "mine are the brown kind."

CHICKEN-HEARTED, PERHAPS. "Harry Mahan has bought a cow and is now supplying his neighbors with milk and eggs," says a Kansas exchange. Would Mr. Mahan consider the sale of his extraordinary cow?—Kansas City Star.

MINUTE DIRECTIONS. Lady: "How is this insect powder to be applied?"

Assistant (absent-mindedly): "Give 'em a teaspoonful after each meal, madam."—Western Christian Advocate.

QUITE NATURALLY. Alvin presented to Tod a handful of marbles. Tod was delighted, and gazed on them in rapturous silence. Alvin, thinking to give him a lesson in politeness asked:

"What do you say, Tod?"

Tod looked up with wide brown eyes and said: "Have you got any more?"

TRENCHING ON HER PRESERVES.—First Landlady. "I manage to keep my boarders longer than you do." Second Landlady—"Oh, I don't know. You keep them so thin that they look longer than they really are."—The Pathfinder.

ANOTHER OF THOSE NOTES.—A Pike County teacher who asked a girl to purchase a grammar, received the following note from the little girl's mother:

"I do not desire that my Matty ingage in grammar and I perfer her to ingage in more useful studies and can learn her to write and speak proper myself. I went through two grammars and can't say as they did me no good. I perfer Matty to ingage in German and drawing and vokal music on the piano."—Florida Times-Union.

Conversions in War Prison Camps

CHEERING news has been received by the Gospel Committee for Work Among European War Prisoners. The actual work in the field is now fairly under way, and extensive rra ements are being carried out for the distribu on n the great European prison camps, of copies f tl Gospels in different languages. In addition to ie riptures, a list of thirty-eight different titles of lig is tracts and booklets printed in various ng ges has been received by the committee, and ais erature is also being widely distributed. Among ie icts and booklets are some of the best Gospel rit gs of Moody, Spurgeon, F. B. Meyer, Dr. orr, the later Dr. Cuyler and others, all that have een lected being of a class hic presents, in most at- act e and striking forms, ie eat truths of Chris- ani.

Le ers from missionary orl s in the camps, just ceied, are full of interest. ast Karl Bösler writes om alzwedel, under date ch 12:

"th the exception of me iterpreters for the war isc rs, only Ruthenians e iterned here. The ibl and New Testaments e r d here much better in e ithenian than in the ussn language, and after str iting the Testaments id er tracts which you so vir y sent to me, I ordered era re in the Ruthenian ng ge.

"Today a 'Little Russian' student asked me for a German Bible. Would you be so kind as to send me one? In addition, I have been requested by Brother Omeltschenko to thank you, in the name of all the brethren who are in the war prisoners' camp at Salzwedel, for the books which have been sent to them, and to request of you, if you have any Russian hymn-books, with or without notes, to send them. These hymn-books are used for our meetings here."

A letter of unusual interest is from a war prisoner, G. Lange, who writes from Schönwalde, March 22.

Fifteen thousand Russian prisoners in Augustowo about to be taken into the interior

"I write to inform you somewhat about the grace of God which I was privileged to experience in the war prisoners' camp at Schneidemühl. In 1914, on the second of December, I came to the war prisoners' camp in Schneidemühl with one hundred and forty other Russians. All of us had been captured at the battle at Lodz. On the way here I had lost my pocket Bible, which my father had bought for me as a keepsake, so that I came to camp without a single page of Scripture. The need was very great, and the good Bible, which had become so precious to me on the battlefield, had gone! Where could I buy one? In the beginning I found not a single soul with whom I could have mutual comfort. Weeks went by until I found a Lithuanian brother. I told him of my trouble. He had a New Testament, and soon out of this book we both were searching for comfort, and both of us were blessed and strengthened. A great stone had been rolled off from my heart. Here there were several Russian Germans. I spoke at once with them of a plan to place before the officials: that there were several evangelicals among us here, and that we should request them to be so kind as to let us have a room for prayer-meetings; and at last we succeeded. Several times I had to lead the meeting. Two came to the knowledge of the truth.

"Meanwhile I found here two Russian Baptist (Stundist) brethren, with whom I began at once to have spiritual fellowship, and in the same room we began to hold Bible and 'prayer hours' (meetings) in the Russian language. God bless the work! We want more souls for the Gospel. After some time the prisoners were sent from Camp No. 3 to Camp No. 2, so that only the first company remained in the place, where I and a Russian friend, who had been awakened, were left behind. The others who went away had left me a Russian Testament. I had already received a German Testament from Brother Schneider of Hamburg, and was very thankful to him for it. Though other believers had left us, still it was good that we two could be here.

"At this time, the fortress of Novogeorgievsk fell. That brought 12,000 more prisoners to our camp! That meant for us a new call, 'Up to the work!' At once I made out an announcement that in one of the barracks [giving the number of it] would be held a Russian evangelical meeting. The first evening we were only three together. We edified each other in the Russian language. The hour we spent together was rich in blessing; I shall never forget it. The meetings were held every night. More and more of the men came, and all listened with great desire. The room at last was quite full. Then God gave us a Russian brother, who had been a missionary, and had been captured, Pavel Malachowski. My heart was full of joy. But still we were lacking in reading material, until the beloved Brother Lehmann helped us out with Bibles, Testaments, and tracts. I express to you my thanks. The joy you have supplied is indescribable, and the blessing is very great. Now we have in the camp twenty-eight newly converted brethren, and ten older converts."

From these letters it will be seen how large a work is opening up before the Gospel Committee—a work which needs the energetic cooperation of every Christian in America who has a true appreciation of this great Gospel opportunity. Letters from the committee's workers will appear from time to time in the Christian Herald, as they are received. Every dollar subscribed to the Gospel Fund for War Prisoners will go direct into field work and will be transformed into a means of spiritual blessing. N turday, May 27, 4,000 men of the B e classes of the Protestant churches all nominations in Paterson, N. J., and init marched in their first Bible class rad The parade was under the supervision d di tion of the Paterson and North Jersey ang stic Association. This is the organiza- n ch was responsible for Billy Sunday coming to Paterson. Sixty-one classes were represented. Thousands of people turned out to view the march. A huge American flag, six by sixteen feet, was used as a turning-point.

THE report for 1915 of the West Side Young Men's Christian Association in New York City is interesting as showing the magnitude of the work for men which now centers around a Y. M. C. A. building. West Side is the largest Y. M. C. A. in the world, the membership on May 10 being 7,412. During 1915 the religious work department held 3,304 meetings, with an attendance of 257,566. Of these 798 were in the building, being attended by 36,458 men and boys; 193,203 men in shops were reached in 1,524 meetings, and 27,205 attended Bible classes. Religious interviews were given to 1,990 men, 1,564 were introduced in churches, and 333 known conversions were recorded. In the educational department 3,763 students were enrolled, and 4,201 separate class sessions were attended by 85,453 men. In the physical department 3,338 were enrolled in gymnasium classes, and the social department engineered 678 events, attended by 90,931 men. The employment department received 4,908 applications from employers and 3,428 from men and boys, of whom 2,643 found jobs. West Side sent out 557 men to help at religious meetings in churches and in community work, and $3,000 was contributed by 1,046 members to the work of the Havana Branch. West Side is entirely self-supporting. Ten years ago, in 1905, West Side had 3,271 members; the religious work department reached only 33,409 men during the year, and only 972 men were enrolled in educational classes.

THE present popularity of white summer clothes for men as well as for women places no hardship on the laundress who knows the possibilities in Ivory Soap. No matter what the material—linen, silk, cotton, flannel, or Palm Beach cloth—no special care is needed so long as Ivory is used.

The use of the mild, pure, white, neutral Ivory eliminates all danger to weave, color and finish. It contains no free alkali—cannot harm the most delicate fabrics. It contains no inferior ingredients—cannot have any effect except the production of sweet, spotless, snowy cleanness.

All that is necessary is to handle each garment as better-than-ordinary clothes always should be handled. That is, wash one piece at a time, use lukewarm water, refrain from rubbing, and dry into shape as far as possible. Because Ivory is the purest and the highest quality soap that can be made, just common sense—not special directions—is needed to make its washing of any kind of clothes beyond criticism.

An Oasis and a Crucible

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

NEW YORK, like every metropolis, is a city of contrasts. Fifth Avenue serves to accentuate the sordid poverty of the Bowery. The New Yorker sneers at the "rubberneck-wa on" which is so much used by the man from out of to , yet is ignorant of the places which the sightseer se s. Wall Street is only an alley, yet in its short le h it runs the gamut from wealth to poverty. The sk rapers, pointing their delicate pinnacles at he en itself, harbor many whose god is gold and wh e creed is greed. One block separates Fifth A nue from Sixth, but it is the con-tra between those who have arrived so lly and those who are toiling an the first foothills on the steep pa . With the most highly devel-op transportation system in the wo d at his disposal, the New Y er tamely submits to the ba aric rush of the subway cr d, burrowing his way to a ti flat because he lives in th biggest city in the world. Th e are obvious contrasts, an I will mention no more of e kind. But there were tw ontrasting institutions in an near New York which in-te ted me deeply. One wa the Bowery Mission, th other the Christian He ld Children's Home at ont-Lawn.

THE heat of midsummer had engulfed th reat city. Families ha overflowed into the str ts, lightly clad par-en resting on the side-wa s and more active ch ren playing games on e pavement, from wh h most of the ped-dle s carts had with-dra n with the closing in of e sultry night. Under th dark mass of the ele-va d the life of the Bow-er till continued. Hardly a b ath of air reached the da ened street. We dropped int the Bowery Mission and cli bed to the visitor's gallery.

was a good meeting. Each of e speakers spoke from his he , and the hopeful words sp ng from the most hopeless exp iences. In the pews sat a t pical rescue mission crowd: sc ely one face there showed cri nal characteristics. From ab e, many a head was bald. Th e were old men, whose he s had bowed to a cruel fat before their time. They were not bad, only we , these occupants of the Mission's seats. Scarcely on ould call himself the captain of his soul. Lack of ecision and weak-willed indulgence had brought th low.

and down the aisle walked a man who, when he sa a head nodding, laid his hand on the stooped sh ders and recalled the man to the surroundings an he speeches. Once in a while a man would growl lik some sullen animal at thus being disturbed, but m tried to keep awake and respectful.

e meeting, led by men who, with one exception, ha volunteered their services to the mission that had rai d them from the condition in which their brothers in e audience found themselves, was short and sn py, punctuated by songs and appeals to the men to t their heavenly Father help them out of the sta which all hated but from which they were too we to lift themselves. If there be any men in all thi world who need a God and a Saviour, these de icts of the Bowery are among them. The appeal co s to them nightly to accept heavenly aid, to re m their spineless lives and glorify their God.

the appeal came over and over again for the decision that could remake these ruined lives, I marveled at the patience of the men in charge of the meeting. I felt like shaking these sodden men into wide-awakeness, saying, "Man, you are still in the running. You still have a chance. The one thing you lack most is decision. You have failed to fashion your life, which once was as noble and pure as any one's; and there is only one Leader that can help you. He has helped these other men and he can help you. Brace up. Take a chance. Make one right decision and then stick to it." I would have been rough. It is so evident that nothing can redeem these men from lethargy but the power of God in their lives.

But the leaders are more sympathetic. They know what it is to wrestle with a decision and come out second best time and again. They understand. So they patiently plead and help as they can, never losing temper, always being friendly and kind.

DECISION cards were passed. Some weakly took them because they did not have the nerve to refuse. A month later, that card, still unsigned and grimy with the fingering of a man who wanted God but could not take the step toward him, might be found in the ragged pocket of a common "bum," dead from drink or suicide. Such things have happened.

Some took the cards and signed them and a new day was opened for them through the helpful cooperation of the Brotherhood, made up of those who have risen by this means and who feel the joy of helping others to the more abundant life that they have come to know. Some refused the cards with a decision that was admirable in such a crowd: admirable but for the fact that it was negative, not positive.

We saw the men file past the table for their coffee and bread. "Rice Christians" you might call them, sitting through a meeting for the sake of the loaves and fishes. But the food was welcomed nevertheless, and was given in the name of a loving Father. Whether they took any stock in the speeches or not, they knew he had furnished them daily bread to keep alive the spark of soul in their slovenly bodies. We fear "dead beats" so much that we forget that even in such craven hearts there is gratitude for a kindly act. And every kindly act at the Bowery Mission is done in the name of the Lord.

WE walked back together through the hot streets, my friend and his wife and I. He and I have often been to church together, but he cares little for ceremony. He has made two or three remarks during the year which have stuck in my mind: "If Jesus were here today preaching and working as he used to do, I would follow him." "Jesus preached the Sermon on the Mount in one day and that preacher takes eight evenings to do it and earn his salary, but the worst of it is I can understand what Jesus said but I can't understand what the preacher says. I can understand healing and helpfulness and love, but I can't understand preaching."

I was anxious to know how this mission meeting had appealed to him.

He said: "That is the kind of Christianity I can understand. Those fellows know what sin is and they have overcome it through God's help and they tell the others so, without being paid for leading the meeting. That's the most Christian service we have ever been to together."

The wife added, "If I had money enough, I would furnish a piece of cake to each of those men. Not just coffee and bread to fill their stomachs. That is necessary first of all. But I would give them a luxury, not to keep them alive till morning but to remind them of a mother's love and a forgotten home."

So we discoursed together as we left the noisy Bowery behind. My friend continued: "It seems awful that we allow such men to drink. One of the leaders told me that ninety per cent. of the men in those seats were there because of booze. I don't see how the government can allow such a curse to be sold to such weak men."

My answer was trite but sincere. "It is because you and a lot of others, who drink a little light wine now and then, fight prohibition because it takes away personal liberty. Those poor fellows have lost their will power. Some of them will do almost anything to get a drink. They are a pitiful lot. But they have personal freedom of choice and it must be protected."

I was glad to get away from the Bowery Mission. It is a clean oasis in the midst of sordid dirt. It is a beautiful hall of worship, set among low dives and groggeries. It is doing a wonderful work in saving those who are so far lost that the church cannot reach them. It uses hunger and fatigue to recruit its motley audiences, many of whose members attend out of curiosity or desire for rest in the comparative coolness of the chapel. It feeds the hungry, clothes the naked and comforts the poor. It carries out the teachings of the One who said, "Come unto me, all ye that labor against a besetting sin and are heavy-laden with indecision and helplessness in the face of a burdening habit, and I will give you rest."

But as I left that place filled with failures, I asked, as my friend had asked, "Why can't some way be found to prevent so many derelicts on the sea of life?" I believe the Bowery Mission is doing a great, a necessary, a Christ-like work. Salvage and junkshop work are necessary on the Bowery. But why, in the name of a loving Father, is a Bowery necessary? Why will our government allow such social sickness to poison our nation? I can admire the way the Bowery Mission does its work. But those bald heads, bowed in shame and unable to look up to a Creator and a loving Father, most of them because of a licensed vice, depress me.

IT was Independence Day, gloriously cool. In the little town of Nyack, the patriotic parade had passed. Set in broad lawns of velvety green and looking off over the majestic Hudson to the city of Tarrytown and the Sleepy Hollow, where Ichabod Crane made history, were many lovely, clean buildings. From several flag-poles Old Glory hung, now in limp folds of red and white, now rippling out in the breeze and disclosing the stars of hope in the midst of war's alarms.

That flag means much to me. I have seen it after months of travel. I have seen it carried by women in a great suffrage parade and by endless lines of men in preparedness marches. I saw that flag return from the Spanish-American war, carried by bronzed troops who had learned its meaning on fields of death. I saw that flag lead the boyish lines of militia to the trains that were to carry them to Mexico. As a member of the National Guard, I have seen that flag slip from its proud height at sunset as the sunset gun boomed and the band played the "Star Spangled Banner." That flag means much to me as I leave the land that gave it birth to travel under other flags. But never did it mean more to me than on that afternoon of Independence Day at Mont-Lawn.

I stood in the balcony of the Children's Temple, looking down on the sea of eager, intelligent faces in the crowded hall. A thrill had passed through me as I heard those childish but sincere voices, in which many a foreign accent could be detected, sing, with admirable vigor and spirit:

> There are many flags in many lands,
>   There are flags of every hue;
> But there is no flag in any land
>   Like our own red, white, and blue.

As they swung into the chorus, hundreds of flags waved and I saw there a crucible of citizenship mingling diverse races into a loyal unit under Old Glory. But the real thrill was to follow.

In front of me, hanging from the balcony, were two large American flags. I had not noticed them in my interest in the vivacious faces of the children gathered there. But when the song ceased, hundreds of small arms shot out toward a spot just below me, and hundreds of determined and spirited voices rang out, "I swear allegiance to my flag."

IT may have been the thought of those khaki-clad masses that had left for possible war; it may have been that I recognized in that group of faces the features native to sunny Italy, proud Greece, Austria, Germany, France, Bulgaria and Ireland; it may have been that the hands seemed to reach out to me as I stood there, seeking for some help and friendship before the ten days of Paradise should end and the heavy masonry of a railway viaduct or the slight shade of towering buildings would supplant those arching trees and that pretty chapel as protection from the hot sun of summer; it may have been the brave assurance, loyalty and optimism in that mass of childhood unified by a common oath of allegiance. I cannot say. But the thrill that passed through me at the sight was such as I have seldom experienced. I felt something of that sensation when I first heard the diverse races in Beirut start out in the song whose tune is America, "God bless our native land." That song applied to many nationalities separately. But this oath of allegiance, so eagerly given, applied to many nationalities fused into the one nation we all love.

I had seen those happy kiddies file into the cheery dining-room and jump up and down with delight when the ice-cream appeared. I had seen them eye the sugar cookies before them, which they must not touch until permission was given. I had seen one tow-headed little fellow stuff a cookie under his blouse when the dismissal bell sounded. I had seen Remington Schuyler sitting with wideawake boys and eating with them while they called him "Jim" for want of a better name. I had seen the patriarchal Dr. Babbit interesting the boys with two pairs of opera glasses, and had seen the quiet little circle who watched the trained broncho, Pinto, count work days and rest days at his master's bidding. I had talked with the boys and smiled at the girls and felt like a kid myself. Then I had thrown my baggage into the auto that was to start me on my long trip and had entered the tiny chapel for a last look at those happy faces of children to whom those ten days meant a new outlook and a more abundant life. I saw those faces marked with respect and reverence and a touch of the awe of childhood in the presence of something that it cannot entirely grasp but whose reality it feels, and I saw the contrast.

Here was new life, pregnant with possibility, ger to imitate the good or the bad, loyal to lov and faithful to friendship. Here was no indecision age smitten with weak-willed habit. These happy ch ren were not hopeless derelicts. They were white-w ged yachts setting out on the tide of life and foll ing Something to a spot beyond the horizon, which h no fears for them. These happy children, singing heir songs and effervescent with joy, had been touch for the moment with a lofty ideal.

At the table these children had repeated in son the little blessing that a blond-haired girlie ght me high up on the slope of the Lebanon, and w h I taught to two adorable kiddies in China. It the simple expression of a childish trust and faith:

> God is great and God is good,
> And we thank him for our food.
> By his hand must all be fed,
> Give us, Lord, our daily bread. Amen.

And here in this little chapel, on the birthday the land of the free, God was giving his children heir daily bread before they should return to the po rty-stricken homes from which they had come. the wall of the dining-room is a verse:

> Back of the loaf is the flour,
>   Back of the flour the mill;
> Back of the mill the seed and the shower,
>   The sun and the Father's will.

As I left that chapel and the sound of the ppy voices died away, I thought of those bowed he s in that other chapel on the Bowery, and I thought the contrast between remorseful age and vibrant uth, still unsullied by the sins of life. I realized wh this vacation means to those children, and I said to self, "Here is Christianity that I can understand."

FOR back of the man is the boy, and back the woman the girl, and into these impressi able young lives there is being introduced somethir that makes for manhood and womanhood. This is a ving Christianity not to the product but to the rce. Among those stoop-shouldered derelicts the are some who will be saved from the life they ha led. But among those happy children are those who lives will be changed by this ten-day vacation, an who, thus changed, will carry help and sunshine and irit-ual life to those who need God. Their lives are the future, not in the past. This is not the ne sary salvage of human wrecks, but development of man possibilities. As I saw those beaming faces, wr thed in smiles and expressive of happiness, I t ght, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Tom Brown Gets Back His Kingdom

WITH yells of ecstasy Sing Sing welcomed back Tom Brown on July 16. After a six months' absence to defend the charges made against him he came back, vindicated in the eyes of the world, back to the hearts of the men who loved and have never doubted him.

How well the new system is working may be guessed from the fact that several hundred convicts were allowed to come outside the prison and await the Warden's coming a long distance from the gate. They were accompanied by only two or three keepers. But they had pledged their word as members of the Mutual Welfare League that they would not take advantage of this opportunity to make a getaway. Along with the sight-seers they awaited Mr. Osborne's coming, ready to lead him back in triumph to his kingdom.

About one o'clock he appeared, left the automobile in which he had been riding, and was greeted by the vanguard of his escort. Within the prison walls, the completed procession presented many amazing features. Floats, symbolizing the working of the new system, passed the reviewing stand; a squad of men in lockstep, with a uniformed keeper marching at their side, symbolized the old system. There were clowns, a "Charli hap-lin," and a goat, bring the inscription: Tom Brown's goat— to get it to see wh will happen." Anoth ban-ner said, "He's i gain —the most famous prisoner in the world"; a ther, "Right is right"; still another, "Welcome, T , old Pal." George Hawkins, a prisoner, personified Uncle Sam, wearing the red, white and blue Yankee oodle suit and an enormously high hat. Tony, le er of "Tom Brown's Aurora Band," waved his aton triumphantly, as his men poured out their w come with the instruments.

her floats exhibited the various crafts of the pr n workshops. Most important of all was a group of en in cap and gown who were delegated to confer up Mr. Osborne and Dean Kirchwey the degree of D tor of Humanity. David Maier was the spokesm at this ceremony and read fluently the Latin de ees and titles the Warden had already earned, ad ng his new degree, "Doctor of Humanity."

r. Osborne in greeting the men said: "I have rep tedly heard since I have been away from here th under the Mutual Welfare League plan men ar reated too leniently, and you may find me a little st ter. I do not coddle you men, as they say I do. W lon't want any coddling here, and will not have an And I, for one, do not want to hear any mush ab t 'the dear prisoners.' I want prisoners only to ge square deal and be treated as men."

e Warden was particularly pleased to read the rep t from the Ford automobile plant in Long Isl d City, of twenty-one ex-convicts who are doing go work there. The reports contain such remarks as good workman," "very good man—always on th job," "excellent man," "thoroughly reliable," "t best man we have!" Of twenty-eight ex-convicts em oyed in the plant, twenty-one had more than ma good. Of the seven who had not, only one had "g e crooked." One was suspected of wrong-doing an the remaining five had failed because of drunkenne Under the old system, not more than twenty-fiv per cent. of the men discharged went straight. Th Long Island report shows seventy-five per cent. ma ng good.

ch as the men love Tom Brown and glad as they are o get him back, there will be real regret over the de rture of Dean Kirchwey. Mr. Osborne, in an ad ess made the afternoon before his return to the prison describing the critical condition of affairs at the prison when the men knew he had been indicted and would have to leave them, said that there was only one man who could really take the situation in hand and save the day. That man was Dean Kirchwey.

In a rarely beautiful speech, Warden Kirchwey had just responded to an address of appreciation made by Mr. Adolph Lewisohn, who as president of the National Committee on Prisons had presented him with a magnificent silver loving-cup, the gift of the committee, in acknowledgment of Dr. Kirchwey's wonderful success at Sing Sing during Mr. Osborne's absence. This ceremony had taken place at the beautiful country home of Mr. Lewisohn at Ardsley, New York, where some two hundred members of the committee and their friends had assembled.

In accepting the gift, Dr. Kirchwey said most modestly that he knew he was not the real hero of the occasion. "If you had given me a crown of gold," he said, "I should pass it on to him. But," he added, "I think I shall keep this cup."

In explaining the real secret of the new system, he declared: "The world is to be saved by sympathy, not by brutality and force." "The way of friendship, mildness and sweet reasonableness" is to be the way of settling the world's disputes. "Mr. Osborne," he said, "had the chance to put his faith into practice. And lo—a miracle!" He believed that men are none the less men because they are behind prison walls. His work was a "great act of faith in our common humanity."

Dr. Kirchwey spoke in the highest terms of the men he had found in Sing Sing. Some of them, he declared, exhibited traits and qualities which he himself "admired, but did not possess." "If I come out of this experience a better man, it is not because of what I have given, but of what I have received."

He confessed frankly that he was sorry to leave. He said he would not choose to stay six months longer, because that would keep Mr. Osborne away, but he would like to have the past six months over again, and then he would like to have them over again after that. He would like to have them about four times. But he declared: "If Sing Sing were situated on the Mount of Vision, and all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them were offered me, I would not keep Tom Brown one day longer out of his kingdom."

Both Mr. Osborne and Dean Kirchwey, while differing in some unimportant details, do their work on the same principles, the principles of love and of faith. They believe in the men; they win their confidence, then they win their love. To those who fear that the new system makes prison life too attractive, Mr. Osborne explains that the real purpose of the prison sentence is not to punish the men, but to cure them, to cure them of their desire to do wrong. A thief is loyal to his pals. That is his one virtue, his never-failing code of ethics. Under the new system the Warden asks the thief to take him into his gang, to let him be his pal. The Warden promises to be "on the level" and is taken at his word. The convicts' fellow prisoners, the keepers, the Warden, are all admitted to his gang. They will be on the level with him and he with them. Then the man is asked to take all society into the same brotherhood and to regard all men not as enemies but as friends. When he has done this and has given evidence of the genuineness of his change of attitude and feeling toward his fellowmen; when he no longer regards society at large as his enemy and persecutor, but as the prisoners' friend—when this point is reached, the cure is complete.

Thus the system of Mr. Osborne and Dean Kirchwey has in it the germ of a great human brotherhood of friendship and sympathy, which, working unitedly and harmoniously, will ultimately prove capable of a social transformation such as all men with a vision long for and which may some day be realized.

Press Comments on the British Blacklist

THE great New York dailies are thunderous in their condemnation of the publishing by the British government of a l of eighty-four firms with which Br sh subjects are forbidden to trade. Th comment editorially as follows:

e Times: "Quite the most tact-es foolish, and unnecessary act of the ritish government during the war, in s our observation has been much at lt, is the drawing up of a blacklist of me four-score business firms and nd iduals in this country, with whom Bri h subjects, under the British Tr ing with the Enemy act, are forbid n to trade. The names upon the list e mostly German names; the firms an corporations appear to be under the anagement of persons of German bir or descent. Many of these busi-nes nen now blacklisted by the British gov nment, however, are American iti ns. The first thing to be said is tha Americans do not derive their rig to trade from consent of the Bri h government. That is the most ser is aspect of the matter, for there are ood reasons to suppose that the bla listing process really in a large mea ure deprives these firms and indiv uals of the right to trade, not with Ge any alone, but elsewhere. It is urg d that British steamship companies will refuse to carry merchandise for con rns thus put under the ban, and tha even neutral shipping lines may dec e their trade, fearing to incur Bri h displeasure, to the injury of the general commerce.

"I the second proclamation concerning ading with the enemy, issued on Sep mber 9, 1914, it was provided:

> "e expression 'enemy' in this proclamation eans any person or body of persons of wha ver nationality resident or carrying on bus ss in the enemy country, but it does not incl e persons of enemy nationality who are neit resident nor carrying on business in the ene country. In the case of incorporated bod enemy character attaches only to those inco orated in the enemy country.

"here was this further provision:

> "ovided always that where an enemy has a bra ch locally situated in British, allied, or neu l territory, not being neutral territory in E ope, transactions by or with such branch shal ot be treated as transactions by or with an e my.

"ll that is changed. Trading with ce ain enumerated class of American citizens and corporations is now forbidden. There is no apparent limit to the extension of a policy so elastic. A, B, and C, being Americans, may trade with each other, presumably without British interference, but if any one of them trades with D, another American who has the hardihood to trade with one of the firms or corporations now blacklisted, it might be held by British authority that the taint affected the whole line with an enemy character, and there would be presented the novel spectacle of a British ban upon the trade of entirely neutral Americans.

"The blacklist is in accord neither with reason nor with law. This doctrine was laid down by our Supreme Court more than a hundred years ago:

> "A Spanish subject who comes to the United States in time of peace to carry on trade, and remains here engaged in trade after war has begun between Spain and Great Britain, is to be deemed an American merchant, by the law of domicile, although by the law of Spain the trade in which he was engaged could be carried on only by a Spanish subject, his neutral character depending, not on the kind of trade in which he was engaged, but on his domicile.

"That doctrine stands squarely opposed to the blacklisting even of German subjects who are engaged in trade in the United States. Of course, the blacklisting of American firms and individuals by Great Britain is an act quite beyond the pale of law, and it is one of which our Government is bound to take notice. . . .

"There has been a good deal of interference with our trade, even with neutral countries; our mails have been detained, questions of considerable gravity have been made the subject of diplomatic correspondence. They still await adjustment. To add to their number by so flagrant an invasion of our rights of trade as would result from the enforcement of this prohibition cannot be considered a tactful proceeding, and it could be justified only by compelling necessity. That condition does not exist."

The World: "In principle Great Britain's commercial blacklist is as plainly an attempt to terrorize neutrals as was Germany's submarine warfare. Germany risked the friendship of the United States by running amuck at sea. Britain engages in the same dangerous trifling when it undertakes to say with whom Americans shall and shall not trade.

"The Kaiser's submersibles fired first and investigated afterward. In like manner the King's government proscribes Americans supposed to be dealing with the enemy and takes no account of the far-reaching consequences. Persisted in, a policy of this kind cannot fail to produce results which may be a painful surprise to its authors.

"It is hardly to be supposed that many people in London believe that the United States will not defend its sovereignty and neutrality as boldly against Great Britain as against Germany. The Allies have had considerable success thus far in bullying Holland, Denmark, Sweden and Norway, whose trade they have interdicted or regulated, and Greece, whose soil they have invaded. It ought not to be necessary to remind the British ministry that the United States is not situated precisely as those nations are, and that it possesses remedies for wrong-doing which they do not.

"In view of the long-continued British aggressions upon our mails, not much time should be wasted in argument over this latest expression of hostility. What Great Britain has done amounts to a declaration of commercial warfare against the United States. It may be the forerunner of the boycott recently discussed in Paris. If so, the time to meet it is now.

"The power of this country to inflict injury upon England is so enormous that we can only feel amazement at the folly of a ministry which, by its misuse of sea power, seems deliberately to have invited retaliation."

The Tribune: "American opinion is very intolerant of blacklists and boycotts. It believes that the use of such weapons is always mean-spirited and cowardly. Our laws and our courts have put a ban on the secondary boycott—a form of proscription which strikes over the head of an opponent at innocent bystanders having nothing to do with the cause of the quarrel. They have also forbidden the use of the written or published blacklist intended to intimidate third parties from dealing with one or other of two groups engaged in economic war.

"The natural instincts of our people have therefore been outraged by the publication of the British government's list of American citizens or of alien citizens and corporations domiciled here with whom British subjects are forbidden to trade. This proclamation is a fresh challenge to our government to resent the unusual and extra-legal measures which Great Britain has taken to control and stifle neutral commerce. It is a most impolitic challenge. The British government has been enforcing a secret boycott against most of these individuals and firms. So long as it was secret our government could not take notice of it. London should have left well enough alone.

"The game is never worth the candle in boycotting and blacklisting enterprises. Our domestic boycotters learned that lesson long ago. Great Britain will learn it to her sorrow if she persists in trying to put a few individuals and firms in this country out of business at the cost of commercial hostilities with the United States.

"We do not deny the right of the British government to say that its subjects shall not deal with the persons on the official blacklist. That result was, in fact, already practically attained before the blacklist was published. The proscribed individuals and firms have now no trade worth speaking about with Great Britain's enemies.

"But if the direct boycott is to be converted into a secondary boycott, the United States will have to take some action in self-defense. If American vessels were to be discriminated against because they carried to neutral countries goods offered by boycotted individuals or firms, our government would be forced to interfere. We could not tolerate such a limitation put upon our shipping under no other warrant than that of British municipal legislation—of a proclamation which, according to the British government's own explanation, is intended to be purely domestic in its effect.

"If a blacklisted American citizen, for instance, wants to send merchandise in an American vessel to South America, the British government has no right under any law to try to discipline, then or later, the shipmaster who accepts such legitimate cargo.

"The United States cannot stand for the secondary boycott on the high seas any more than it can stand for the secondary boycott at home. The most sensible thing Mr. Asquith's government could do under the circumstances would

The late Professor Elie Metchnikoff

GREAT SCIENTIST DIES. Professor Elie Metchnikoff, bacteriologist and pioneer in science, died in Paris July 15, aged seventy-one. It was Professor Metchnikoff who thought he had discovered in what he called "glycobacteria" a sure cure for old age. His cure for senility was known as the "buttermilk" cure. Metchnikoff's first great service to medical science was rendered in 1882, when he discovered the true nature of inflammation. Virchow, the German scientist, had discovered the leucocytes, the little policemen of the blood. Pasteur the Frenchman had discovered microbes, and Metchnikoff the Russian showed that the congestion of blood about a wound, which we call inflammation, was a rushing of the leucocytes to give battle to the microbes. Professor Metchnikoff was associated with Pasteur in the Pasteur Institute, and succeeded the founder as head of the institute in 1895. In 1912 he announced a treatment for diabetes which has been widely used with good success. His widest celebrity came, however, through his advocacy of the Bulgarian drink, sour milk, as an antidote to the infirmities of age.

LINCOLN CABIN ACCEPTED. President Wilson, on July 17, signed the bill accepting for the Federal government from the Lincoln Farm Association the gift of the log cabin near Hodgenville, Ky., in which Abraham Lincoln was born. The cabin has been enclosed in a memorial hall.

RURAL CREDITS BILL SIGNED. The Rural Credits Bill, which creates a system of land loan banks throughout the Union, was signed by the President on July 17. The bill establishes twelve banks, and makes available for long time loans, made on an easy repayment basis, the great resources of the Federal Reserve Banks. The principal features of the bill were given in the Christian Herald of March 8.

COLLIER HECTOR SINKS. The United States collier Hector, en route from Port Royal to Santo Domingo with sixty marine recruits and a crew of eighty-two, was disabled July 12 in a hurricane that swept up the Atlantic coast. Her wireless calls brought her assistance. The Hector tried to make port at Charleston, S. C., but ran aground before she could reach the harbor and broke in two. In spite of the terrific seas that were running, all on board were rescued by tugs. The Hector was of the newest type of collier and had been in service only eight years.

NEW AMBASSADOR TO TURKEY. Mr. Abram I. Elkus of New York was nominated on July 18, to be ambassador to Turkey to succeed Mr. Henry Morgenthau. Mr. Elkus is a lawyer and social reformer; he has rendered much valuable public service, but has never held public office.

FUSION INCOMPLETE. Mr. John M. Parker of Louisiana, candidate for Vice-President on the Progressive ticket, has called a new Progressive Convention to meet in Chicago on August 5. He urges that the bull-moose be buried and that the party make a new start under no less an emblem than the eagle. Mr. Parker represents the not inconsiderable element of the Progressive party made up of Southern men who seek to get away from one-party government.

IN THE SWEEP OF THE FLOODS. Southern states, chiefly North and South Carolina and Georgia, suffered great damage from floods in the second week of July. Rivers changed their courses, dams burst, mills and trains were overwhelmed, telegraph and telephone service became demoralized. The flood was worst around Asheville and Biltmore, N. C. More than fifty lives were known to have been lost at last reports, and it was said that the property loss exceeded $15,000,000 and that it would take many weeks to rebuild the railways and restore normal operation in the mills.

TO INVESTIGATE RAILWAYS. A commission of Congress, five members from each House, is to be appointed to make a thorough and searching investigation into every phase of the transportation problem in the United States and report by the second Monday in January, 1917.

FIRE DESTROYS GREEK KING'S CHATEAU. Fire, which the police are satisfied was started by accident, raged through the pine forest surrounding the summer chateau of the Greek king, destroyed his palace, the old palace residence of the crown prince, the queen mother's villa and the royal garage. King Constantine was trapped by the flames and fainted while directing the salvaging of property from the burning palace. He was rescued by soldiers. Thirty-two lives were lost in the fire.

PRESIDENT FIGHTS FOR CHILDREN. In planning how best to assure an early closing of Congress, the Democratic caucus placed certain bills on the calendar for passage and placed certain others on a second list to be passed if time permitted. Among this second class was included, it is said through the opposition to it of Southern senators, the House bill which would prevent shipment in interstate commerce of goods manufactured in whole or in part by children. On July 17, the President went to the capital and in a conference with Senate leaders insisted that this bill be passed.

THOROUGHLY GOOD INDIANS. or wages that fall below $840 a year. The New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor states that a family of four can be clothed on an expenditure of $106.65 a year, the division being as follows: man, $29.20; woman, $28.75; boy fourteen years old, $26.05; girl twelve years old, $22.65. This schedule might be made to do on a pinch, but it would be an awful pinch, and some of the purchases would need to be made at a rummage sale.

Missionaries Killed in Japan. Rev. W. A. F. Campbell and wife, Canadian missionaries in Japan, were stabbed to death by a native burglar in their summer cottage at Karuizawa, on July 16. Mr. Campbell recently volunteered for service with a Canadian contingent in the European War and was about to return home. He and his wife were workers of the M. E. Church in Canada.

Bomb Greets Defense Parade. During a preparedness parade in San Francisco on July 22, a bomb was exploded in a suit-case on a densely crowded corner. The suit-case had been packed with nails and slugs, and the explosion sent these missiles flying into the crowd. Six persons were killed and twenty-five seriously injured. The parade was only interrupted. An anarchist warning had been sent to one of the San Francisco papers, and after the explosion a Finnish sailor, Frank Joohs, an anarchist, was arrested.

Cloak Strike Compromised. The strike of the cloakmakers in New York City, which began with a lockout on April 28, was settled on July 22 by a compromise. A week of conferences between representatives of the manufacturers and of the 60,000 workers had ended in failure on July 18 and was followed on the 20th by an appeal to the President and by an order directing the Departments of Commerce and of Labor to inquiro into the strike. The threat of governmental action apparently cast a new light on the case, for the employers, who had refused the union's offer of arbitration, initiated a new conference at once. As a result the workers get a six per cent. increase in wages and the preferential shop, in which union men are given the preference when a position is open, a standard scale of pay for pieceworkers and a forty-nine hour week. The employers win the unhindered right to discharge inefficient workers and to decrease employment in accordance with the condition of the trade. The protocol under which the industry has worked for five years, and which was hailed as the harbinger of permanent industrial peace, is abolished, as is the permanent board of conciliation. The strike has kept 200,000 people idle and is estimated to have cost the workers $5,000,000 in wages and the employers a great deal more.

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

On the Picardy portion of the western front, on Friday, July 14, for the first time since July 2, the British advanced beyond the line reached by them on that day. This advance took place on that portion of the British front north of the river Somme which extends from the village of Ovillers on the north to Contalmaison on the south, about two miles. Moving eastward from this base early in the morning of last Friday, tho British drove their line forward as far as the villages of Bazentin and Longueval on the road connecting Miraucourt with Marincourt. In the territory thus captured were the whole of the Trones, the scene the week before of such ferocious and continuous fighting. The following night the Germans counter-attacked and recaptured Bazentin, but were only in possession thereof for a few hours when they were again driven out.

Monday hard fighting again began in the midst of a driving storm, and culminated in the British capturing some fifteen hundred feet of trenches northwest of Bazentin, a gain which, small in itself, derived importance from the fact that the possession of these trenches gave adequate protection to their flank, which was previously exposed. Another minor gain was made by the British northwest of Ovillers.

The net result of the offensive of the Allies on the Picardy front for the twenty-one days this offensive has lasted, is the capture of about 45 square miles of territory, and about 21,000 men, besides a considerable quantity of artillery and war supplies of various kinds; but neither of the primary objectives, Péronne or Bapaume, has yet been taken, and as against the prisoners taken by the Allies, the Germans have captured some four thousand of the Allies troops in their various counter-attacks.

It is impossible not to express a word of admiration for the magnificent work again being accomplished by General Foch, who is most seriously handicapped in his strategy by the French shortness of men, which shortness of of men is undoubted and is established by the facts that in the early stages of the Verdun operations the French were obliged to have the British take over a comparatively large portion of their lines, that Russia at the request of France has sent troops into France to help in the fighting, that the French are again putting colonial (colored) troops into the line, though these were found wanting in the early stages of the war and withdrawn; and above all by the fact that the classes of 1889 and 1890—that is, men 47 and 48—are now on the actual firing line.

The Verdun front has been rather quiet as far as infantry fighting goes during the past week. On the west front of the fortress there has been some little fighting of the skirmish order south of Hill 304, which apparently turned to French advantage, while on the north front the French have launched an offensive to the southwest of Fleury which has gained some ground. For their part the Germans have contented themselves with continuing their heavy bombardment of the Fort de Souville region of this northern front, while on the western they have from time to time bombarded Chattancourt, Esnes and the region south of these villages.

Another contingent of unarmed Russians arrived in France, this time at Brest, probably coming from Archangel. This brings the total of the Russians now in France up to twenty-five or thirty thousand.

The Austro-Italian front presented only one event out of the commonplace the last week. The Italians blew off the top of a mountain—Castelleto—in the Tofana region, burying the Austrian force occupying it in the débris, on July 14. This is the second time in the war they have reported a partial leveling of the Alps.

The expenses of the war to Great Britain were stated by Mr. McKenna in Parliament on the Monday of the week, to have reached the staggering sum of $30,000,000 daily, and a warning was given that it was probable that these expenses would still further increase and that it was the intention of the government to apply to Parliament very shortly for fresh borrowing powers.

In Mesopotamia quiet has prevailed during the week.

In west Persia the Turks defeated the Russians near Souah, and are gradually forcing the Russian left wing farther and farther from the Turkish frontier.

In the Caucasus the Russians announced the capture of Baiburt, to the northwest of Erzerum, and about tho half-way point between that fortress and Trebizond on the Black Sea. Thus in the months which have elapsed since the capture of Erzerum the Russians have covered half the distance necessary to be covered to link up their center and right wing. Owing to the topographical obstacles, the remaining half of this distance will probably be even more difficult to cover.

Russian attempts to advance in the direction of Erzingan have been repulsed by the Turks.

On the Russian left wing, while there have been skirmishes in the immediate vicinity of Trebizond, these have been without importance and besides have been favorable to the Turks in their results.

The announcement was made in Petrograd during the week that it had been agreed between the Allies that Russia was to take both banks of the Bosphorus and of the Dardanelles at the end of the war.

The situation on the Russian front is extremely difficult to grasp. Apparently it is certain that in the north, from Riga to the Pripet marshes, between Riga and Jacobstadt, the Russians have made several attacks on Von Hindenburg's lines, some of which have gained local advantages and some of which have been repulsed but none of which, except for the number of men engaged, have been noteworthy. Near Jacobstadt a determined but unsuccessful attempt was made by the Russians to cross the Dwina River.

South to the Pripet marshes as far as the Stochod River nothing of importance happened.

On the Stochod River there has been very heavy fighting, and as these lines are written there are reports that one of the fiercest battles of the war is now going on.

In the region directly west of Lutsk, around Kiselin, there seems to have been little or no change during the week. Southwest of Lutsk, the Teutons have been forced back to the southern bank of the Lupa, not Lipa, River, as the daily press stated. The latter river is in Galicia, miles away. This is a considerable Russian gain, and relieves the pressure on Lutsk from the southwest. The Russians claim 13,000 prisoners in the fighting preliminary to the German retreat.

Southward in Galicia the situation is extremely obscure. There has been some heavy fighting on the lower Stripa in which the Russians state that they completely defeated the Teutons and forced them to a demoralized retreat, besides taking thousands of prisoners, while on the other hand the Germans claim to have repulsed all Russian attacks with heavy losses to the enemy.

In southern Bukowina there has also been lively fighting northwest of Kimpolung, where again both sides claim victory. At all events the press statements that there are Russian troops in either Transylvania or Hungary are probably at least premature, as the Russian official bulletins have never made any such claim to July 21.

The Evening Mail: "The putting of American firms upon a blacklist is a perfectly logical, even if lawless, thing to do. It is a logical outcome of a condition which, by our inaction, we have allowed to become almost legalized, namely, the British blockade. If Great Britain is maintaining a lawful blockade of Germany, then tho great mass of our people will not see the injustice and illegality of Great Britain in boycotting American firms who try to circumvent the blockade and deal with Germany either in goods, money or credits.

"To be sure, the government at Washington has declared tho British blockade lawless and indefensible. We said that on March 30, 1915. We said it again on October 21, 1915. But we have never supported one single shipper in his attempt to exercise the right—which we diplomatically proclaimed that he had—to ship to Germany any goods but contraband of war. We stood by and saw the meat-packers forced to sign an agreement with the British government that they would cease trying to trade with Germany and submit even their shipments to neutral countries to the direction of the British admiralty. We stood by and saw Standard Oil forced to sign a similar contract. The State Department has maintained two foreign trade advisers whose function has been to transmit to American exporters, from the British ambassador at Washington, information as to how these American exporters can send shipments to European neutral countries without incurring suspicion that the shipments are destined to be forwarded to Germany.

"Well, then, the British government decides to punish, by blacklisting, the wicked American bankers and exporters who have been offending against a lawless British measure, against which our State Department protests, but which our State Department helps to enforce.

"Theoretically Great Britain is all wrong and violating a fundamental of international law. A firm incorporated in the United States is an American citizen, no matter whose money is in the corporation. American citizens are supposed to be protected by our treaties with Great Britain in the enjoyment of unabridged rights to trade. These rights are now withdrawn by Great Britain, who sets out to ruin American citizens and corporations accused of doing what their State Department told them was lawful—trading with Germany.

"These men are to be ruined. No British ship will carry their goods nor will any neutral ship-owner carry them lest the offending ship be detained in a British port ten days at a loss of $5,000 per day. The blacklisted firms cannot trade anywhere in the world."

The American: "This week the British government has taken occasion to emphasize again its contempt of American rights and its perfect confidence that our government will do nothing to defend American rights against British aggression.

"An order has been issued forbidding British subjects to trade with specified American firms, to the number of eighty-five, which are not favorably regarded by the British Board of Trade.

"And a specific order has been issued forbidding the American Red Cross to send hospital supplies for the use of the sick and wounded to Germany or Austria.

"These two orders are in direct contravention of the recognized law of nations, of the provisions of the Hague conferences and the Declaration of London, and of the positive and reiterated declarations of international law made by the British government in former years in the course of negotiations with Germany, France, Russia and Japan.

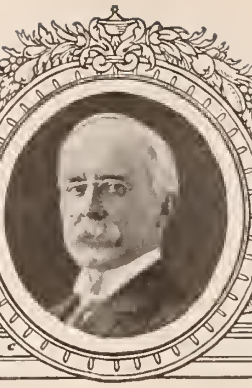
"These orders are also made in contemptuous disregard of the rights and the dignity of the United States as a sovereign power.

"At the same time that these fresh insults are given to us the seizure and retention of American mails continues to be a daily occurrence, though it has been weeks and months since Mr. Lansing informed the British government that the United States would no longer tolerate such treatment of its mails.

"The British peoplo owe it to our interference, and to our interference alone, that they now have enough to eat, that they are not in the grip of famine.

"If we had kept ourselves out of the war, if we had not cared how many British ships were sunk by German submarines, if we had not been the active ally of England on the sea, the people of England would be in a state of starvation by this time."

THE WAY TO KNOWLEDGE



A SERMON

By

*REV. J. H. JOWETT, M.A.

TEXT—John 7:17, R. V. "If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching, whether it be of God, or whether I speak from myself."

TO quietly repeat the words is to obtain their exposition. "If any man willeth to do . . . he shall know!" The quality of our perceptions is to be determined by the character of our wills. If we look after our moral wills our spiritual eyes will attend to themselves. Our visions wait upon our volitions. Moral obedience is the secret of spiritual discernment. "If any man willeth to do"—that is the first step in the exploration of eternal truth; that is the "open seasame" into the region of light and glory. "If any man willeth to do"—that is the instrument; "he shall know;" that is the consequent revelation. "If any man willeth to do"—that is the telescope through which we survey the far-stretching panorama of Gospel truth; or it is the microscope through which we discern the mind of God in the immediate problem. "He shall know!" The first part of my text proclaims the means, the second enshrines the issues.

But now here is an apparent paradox. "If any man will do his will, he shall know." Yes, but our ignorance may center upon the very will we have to do. The will of God itself may be the unknown quantity, and how can we walk the hidden and unknown way? "If any man will do his will he shall know." But I must know the will before I can do it; and how if it is just here that the darkness gathers? Surely light must come before achievement, or achievement itself can never be born. And it is just in this difficulty that the Revised Version comes with its gracious aid. In the old version the difficulty is presented with very obtrusive baldness:—"If any man will do . . . he shall know." The Revised Version lays the difficulty to rest. It takes us a step farther back, away to the preparatory conditions before any deed is yet accomplished. "If any man willeth to do . . . he shall know!" Back from doing to willingness to do! We are led from the realm of conduct to the region of character, from finished deed to primary aspirations. "If any man willeth to do His will!" I do not know his will as yet; my feet are stayed; I see no track across the moor! But am I willing to follow the light when the light appears? Are my feet ready to tread the way whenever it emerges clear from the surrounding waste? How sets my will? "If any man willeth to do . . . he shall know." And so the primary condition is not a moral act but a moral attitude; it is not initially a finished product but a preparatory mold; not an achievement, but a "frame" of mind by which all achievements are determined. It is not something done, but a readiness to do. "If any man willeth to do His will, he shall know."

HERE, then, is where our Master begins. He begins in the secret background and abyss of disposition, and there he seeks the requisite conditions. You are seeking light and truth, insight into spiritual verities, visions of the awful glory. Then, according to this teaching, the prescribed means of attainment are not to be found in the measure of your actual obedience, but in the quality of your will. You have not yet discovered "the Holy Child"; are you eagerly willing to follow the first faint star that may lead to him? Have you the will to become more than a star-gazer, and to become a pilgrim, steadily and steadfastly heeding its kindly ray? Then to that willingness to follow shall light be given, for "he that willeth to do his will, shall know."

But may we not burrow a little farther into this statement of primary condition? The presupposition of a soul, bowed in submissiveness of will, waiting in eager vigilance the lighting of the first lamp that will even partially remove the burden of the unknown moor, is surely just the assumption of a soul possessed by reverence and godly fear. For what is reverence? It is soul-homage paid to the light, whether it shine in flickering candle or blazing star. And therefore, in these prerequisite conditions for spiritual perception as taught by our Lord, I discover the elements of reverence, of vigilance, and of holy fear; and to all such reverent watchers, watching not for idle curiosity but for the sacred purpose of practical obedience, the light is promised, and the hidden things are brought to view. "If any man willeth to do His will," if he is initially willing, if he has a healthy bias; if there be an eager and reverent inclination, then he has within him the very secret of spiritual perception; the darkening clouds shall open before him, and he "shall know" the mind of God.

BUT how may we assure ourselves that this healthy, reverent bias is ours? We may judge our primary bias by our treatment of the light which we have already received. Our inclinations are reflected in our ways; our inclinations are the molds in which our deeds are shaped. What then have our deeds to say about our inclinations? What have we done with the light which has already been given? For, brethren, God has nowhere and at no time left himself without a witness. In no man's life, however imprisoned and bewildered, is there ever a heaven without a twinkle of guiding light. On the darkening wastes of every life, with all its moors and fens and torrents, there is a kindly gleam. Many things are hidden, but all things are not obscure. Some things are clear; and what have we done with them? We are praying for larger days, and there is a little glow-lamp close at our feet. What have we done with that? Are we asking for stars and at the same time despising candles? Are we waiting for light upon unknown continents, and disdaining the proffered lamp that would guide us down the street? We are, perhaps, wanting the sun to rise upon the dark and awful mysteries of the Atonement, while in our immediate presence there shines the light of a vivid and neglected duty.

Now, our text makes one thing plain, and we shall do infinitely well to heed it; that sun-rises are not for those who neglect candles, and that we need never expect to enter into the illumined recesses of sacred truth if the condemnatory light of despised lamps is shining in our rear. "If any man willeth to do His will, he shall know," and we are pathetically and tragically foolish if we are seeking the knowledge by any other road. The way to firm, fine perception, and therefore to the rich unfolding of truth and glory, is not through metaphysics, or by the towering aspirations of philosophic Babels, but by the humble commonplace road of reverent moral obedience.

You are seeking for light on this and that great height of revelation, looming there, dim and uncertain in the enveloping shades: but along what lines are you making the search? "Well, I am reading hard at So-and-so, and So-and-so." Ay, and the reading of men who have found may be a very blessed and helpful ministry, but it is altogether a ministry of the second rank. You may read, and read, and read, and the looming heights will remain in the imprisoning shades. It is not primarily a matter of reading but of living; not of study, but of duty; and to attend to the one to the neglect of the other is like busying yourselves with spectacles and at the same time neglecting your eyes.

I may master a book of the Atonement, I may become so familiar with it as to be able to tell off all its arguments with consummate ease, and yet the ultimate secret of the Atonement may be dark and hid. No, it is not by mastering a book, but by mastering myself, that I shall come to know the treasures of the light; not by accumulated arguments, but by steady and persistent obedience. You may sit down to Butler's "Analogy," and you may read him through the perverting atmosphere of neglected duty, and you will know infinitely less of God than a poor peasant who is quite unable to read, but who has gazed upon the Almighty through the blessed medium of chastened and scrupulous obedience. "Thou hast been faithful over a few things: I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou!" and the shadowing veil divides, and the illiterate peasant passes into the ever-enlarging dominion of light and joy and peace.

AND so I think that many of us are on the wrong road. We are perverting the emphasis, and we are putting second things first. We are seeking to know the mind of the Lord, to disengage his truth, when all the time we are rebels to the truth we know. Now a neglected duty always pollutes the air like a neglected lamp; it contributes smoke when it was purposed to contribute light, and the very minister of illumination makes the atmosphere more dense and opaque. In our quest for God and truth we must therefore see to it that there are no smoking lamps, and we do this when we firmly set ourselves to do the will we know. There are whole continents of spiritual truth lying back in twilight and night, but there is a fringe of revelation in the foreground, glimpses of our Lord's will which leave us i no manner of doubt. Let us begin with the wi we know, and through it move on to the unknown. But when I say "the will we know," I mean all th will we know. We are not to choose a candle here nd a candle there, and reject and ignore the rest.

I read a very intense and eager article a we or two ago, in which ministers were urged to leav he speculations of the apostle Paul, and to abide i he practical teachings of the Sermon on the M nt. Very well, then, what does that mean? The articl on-tinued in greater detail and with growing vehen nce urged that we should declare our Lord's will out the treatment of the poor, the down-trodden, th oppressed. I am well content to give the emphasis but I must also say that such emphasis would not ver the revealed will of the Saviour on the Moun If we are to have the Sermon on the Mount, let us ave the whole of it.

Here again, I say, we must not pick and c ose among the lamps. If we are seeking the land c he morning, we must not despise a single candle ich gives its kindly guidance by the way. Here i one of the "practical teachings" of the Sermon o he Mount: "Pray to thy Father which is in sec t." This is a part of the revealed will, a clear bit of l ap-light to lead us on to larger visions.

And in the same Sermon on the Mount, I fine his second lamp swinging in the appointed way, nd intended to be of service to exploring pilgrims: " ove your enemies!" That, too, is a bit of the Lord's ill. the Lord whose fuller will we yearn to know. " ove your enemies!" That is clear enough! My Sav ur, it is too clear! "The spirits that surround hy throne" may bear its blazing ray: but for childr of the pilgrim-road it is altogether too clear! My brethren, when I come to blazing lamps like t se. with a spirit of willingness to do his will, I mak he discovery of my complete and utter impotence. nd is not that in itself a fulfilment of the promise ny text? Have I not made a real advance in know lge when I discover my own impotence? Is not that ery discovery a gracious achievement? For in my i potence I grope about for my resources, and my gro ngs bring me very speedily into the fellowship o he apostles John and Paul, as they gather about the oss of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. But be hat as it may, let me once more repeat that we mus not choose and reject among the lamps; but whe ver we find a clear revelation of our Master's will, is through scrupulous obedience that we must see he unveiling of the truth that still remains hid.

THIS willingness to do His will, whether I fin he clear revelation in the sacred Word or i the private oratory of my own conscience, gives t ny life the requisite atmosphere in which all sacred uth is to be discerned. To be willing to do his will nd to do it, gathers into the life a certain air of refine ent which is the only congenial medium for the disc ery of spiritual truth. Everybody has noticed how cl rly sounds travel when there is snow on the gr nd. When that white vesture clothes the earth, oft sounds become articulate, and doubtful calling become clear. And when, by scrupulous obedien to the will of the Saviour, the heart grows pure wh it is clothed in the habits of consecration which dim en the whiteness of the virgin snow, then do the dou ful utterances of our Lord become articulate, and uggestions of remote and hidden truth speak cl rly in our respective ears. "If any man willeth do His will, he shall know of the teaching."

If there be a God, a holy and gracious God, is surely, surely true that we shall be permitted to ow him, to have communion with him, and to sha his awful secrets, through the all-pellucid mediu of scrupulous obedience to his will. And so we ne to go down upon our knees, that first of all we ma ask forgiveness for that long procession of negl ted duties which can never be discharged; and th to pray that we may address ourselves to the imm ate duty, however unwelcome it may be, as if upon hat duty depended all that we shall ever know o the "hidden things" of God. And so here is the c ine order for the guidance of our feet. "Have r rcy upon me, O God: according to the multitude o hy tender mercies blot out my transgressions." "C ate within me a clean heart, O God, and renew a ght spirit within me." "Help me to walk in the pa o thy commandments." "Send out thy light an hy truth, let them lead me, and let them bring r to thy holy hill."

Returning in Power

SUNDAY, August 6. Luke 4 : 14. "And Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee." Our Master had been in the wilderness of temptation, and he returned with a vaster eq pment for his holy service. The thief cometh not bu or to steal, and to kill, and to destroy; but here th hief had been robbed, and the despoiler had been sp ed. The tempter had been made to strengthen th empted. The very temptation had been coerced int a minister of increased resources. The Lord Jes emerged in power! The wilderness had become a s ool, a gymnasium, a scene of combat and wrestli ; and so far from being spiritually destroyed, the M er put on strength and victory like a robe. As Sa uel Rutherford quaintly says, in one of his letters to arian McNaught, "God can make a stepping-sto of the devil himself for setting forward His wo !"

d all this teaches me how I must think about my ter tations. I must look upon temptation as opportu y. I must regard it, not as something to be fea d, but as something to be spoiled. It is like some fro ing, bristling city which I am to overthrow and sac The bigger the temptation, the richer the booty! Th harder the conflict, the more robust shall be my str gth. And so it is that the apostle counsels us to co it all joy when we fall among temptations! Th are often full of menace, but splendid wealth hid behind the guns! Refuse to yield and the wealth is urs! Our manifold temptations are just the thr tening side of manifold treasures. If we overco the tempter, we shall return in power.

d so it is that we are never so near great riches as wh we are sorely tried. This is surely very heartening! In great temptations we are being favored with a s ing opportunity, and we are to count it all joy. W ust fix our minds upon the rich possibilities, and, wit all the strength of our being, resolve that they sha be realized. Let us maintain a positive attitude to r foe. Let us fight the good fight of faith, assured tha every victory will make us nobler soldiers. And let fight in the holy fellowship of the Captain of our Sal tion, who, himself being tempted, turned his wil rness into a place of springs, and who will so str gthen his disciples that their wilderness and solitar place shall be glad, and their desert shall rejoi and lossom as the rose. The Power That Heals and Rejoices

M NDAY, August 7. Mal. 4 : 1-6. "The Sun of Righteousness with healing in his wings." It was the pular belief of the Hebrew people, to whom these wor s were addressed, that the rays of the morning sun istilled the dew. So when dawn comes to those wh have been sick and sleepless through the long bla night, its beams bring relief and healing. The act e quality of light is well known. "Get out, get in e sunshine, get a sunbath"—such is the advice wh a wise doctor will give to his patients at a certain sta of illness. But how true it is of the fellowship of Jes with the believer!

W are sore wounded by the attacks of our enemies, the ibs and shocks and hurts of mortal life, the fret an hafe of little things, the assaults of Apollyon in the alley of Humiliation; but when we withdraw fro these into the calm, sweet, strong presence of our Lor a marvelous healing process is at once instituted. W xperience what the Psalmist describes as "the hea of his countenance." To adopt the poet's phr e, it is "as though our very blood, long breathless lai ath tasted of the breath of God again." Those wh ave tasted of it may speak of it. It is a wonder, rea ing far beyond the ken of human wisdom, but it is a experience to the heart. We then possess more joy an earth can lend, and may attain what time sha never spend. F. B. M.

Enthusiasm in Our Work

T ESDAY, August 8. Eccl. 9 : 10. "Whatsoever hy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." The Ro ns had two proverbs about work, namely, "L or conquers all difficulties," and "Labor is itself a p sure."

Y the power and the possibility of our labor depen upon the enthusiasm living and burning behind t. ukewarm, careless work never conquered diffi ults, neither is it usually regarded as pleasure. It is the task that we do with all our might, the work upon which we put out all our strength, that brings the peculiar satisfaction. Robert Louis Stevenson once said: "I know what pleasure is, for I have done good work."

Jesus is the Christian's great example. He was the Christ of work. He worked with all his might. He was so charged with his mission that he himself said that he was straitened until his task could be accomplished. His enthusiasm was contagious. His disciples caught it, and it transformed them from timid souls into brave crusading soldiers of the Cross.

We are enjoined to work with this kind of enthusiasm in order to guard our hearts from temptation and because of the brevity of life—"The night cometh when no man can work." The measure of our success depends upon how much or how irresistibly we want that success. You can never defeat a man who works with all his might. He falls but to rise again.

"Wha 's brave? what's noble?
Let's do it, and make Death proud to take us."

Divine Help in Trial and Suffering

WEDNESDAY, August 9. Dan. 3 : 16-30. "Lo, I see four men loose." The faith of the church cannot be mistaken in believing that this Fourth was our Lord himself, in one of those mysterious appearances which preceded the Incarnation. Repeatedly on the page of Scripture we become aware of the Presence of One fairer than the sons of men and mightier than the angels of heaven. For instance, it was more than an angel who appeared to Moses at the burning bush, and bade him take off his sandals, and said: "I am Jehovah." This Fourth—to quote the old rendering—was like the Son of God.

Is not this the service that our Lord is always rendering to his persecuted and suffering people? They dare to stand erect notwithstanding the universal subservience of the crowd. If conscience toward God forbids them kneeling, they will brave the royal edicts, and forfeit position, comfort, home, influence, and life itself rather than forego the testimony of a good conscience. But the Lord is not unmindful of his own. He is afflicted in all their affliction. He treads the glowing coals beside them, engaging them in such heavenly converse as makes the burning fire sweeter than the dew-besprinkled glades of Paradise. We are never alone in the dread hours of scorn and suffering, through which we may have to pass for his dear name.

The four men were loose. They had been hastily bound and cast into a fire, so fierce that its flames slew the mightiest men of the army who ventured near, but in their case only the bonds that held them were destroyed, not a hair of their head was even singed. Suffering destroys our limitations and enables us to experience the liberty wherewith the Son makes free. We lose nothing but our bonds! F. B. M.

The Surety of Faith

THURSDAY, August 10. Job 13 : 15. "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him." It is a period when men's faith in God is tested. Men are saying all about us, "How can I trust God, if he allows such awful things as are now happening in Europe?" It is the same cry that faithless souls have always uttered when they have found themselves in calamity or deep sorrow, or perhaps laid aside by illness.

Job had such a period. His faith in God was unshaken. He cried, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him." Why could he say this? It was because he had had experience with God. He had become acquainted with God's character.

A man said in my hearing recently about a friend whom he knew and loved but who was under a cloud of suspicion: "I don't know what he has done, but I have utter confidence, born of years of experience with him, that he would not do wrong."

This is something like the belief man has in a God with whom he has walked in varying light and shadow through the years. Our faith in God does not hang by the last expression, but it grows out of many evidences of his trustworthiness. It grows out of what we have learned about God as love. We come to judge God as we judge our friends by past conduct.

The man whose Christian faith has brought him to know God will not be moved out of that faith by things he cannot easily or at once understand. The secret of faith, in these tragic days, is in the nature of God. To have looked once into the depth of his love is to be able to say with Job: "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him." C. S. C.

The Revelation of the Clouds

FRIDAY, August 11. Dan. 7 : 1-14. "There came with the clouds of heaven one like a Son of Man." Our Lord quoted this at the tribunal of Caiaphas, and it underlies many references in the New Testament. The clouds furnish one of the chief attractions of nature. They combine the attractiveness of the mountains with the changefulness of the ocean; sometimes black and terrible, or bright in the smiles of the sun, rolling up against the wind or floating lazily in the upper air, yet everywhere and always conveying the sense of mystery and wonder. What is meant when we are told that the Son of Man, when he comes to take the kingship of the world, will come with clouds?

It suggests in part his revealed majesty and beauty, because the sun is never so glorious in appearance as when the cloud-curtains of the east are radiant with the growing glory of the dawn, or when he sinks to rest in a sky of gold. When Jesus becomes the King of our heart and life, when he comes in any great revival of religion, when he shall come to receive the kingdom of the world, there must be an unraveling, an extension, a spreading-forth of the glorious attributes of his nature, as when the clouds catch the sunbeams, and toss them back from different angles, and make revealings of their contents that had never occurred to us save for their interposition. Is it not always the case that the clouds which overshadow our lives become methods of revelation when Jesus draws nigh? His ways are often dark and mysterious. Clouds and darkness are round about him. He comes in clouds; but he always comes to the believer with the clouds; and when he does, he turns the clouds inside out and shows that they are a very cloth of gold. Our clouds, after all, have given us the most illuminating knowledge of our King. F. B. M.

The Power of His Name

SATURDAY, August 12. John 14 : 14. "If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it." On a certain battlefield in the Civil War a soldier attended another who had fallen and had but a few moments to live. The dying man wrote on an old envelope, "Dear Father, I am dying on the battlefield. My friend is helping me. If ever he should come to you, help him," and signed, "For Charlie's sake." When the friend presented the note to the father, he threw his arms around the soldier and exclaimed, "Everything I have is yours. You may live in my home; you may have the aid of my money, my position, my all." The magic name of his boy, Charlie, worked wonders.

So when the needy soul comes to the heavenly Father with the matchless name of Jesus, he will invite you into his mansion home and give you the freedom of the city of God and of his wide universe of worlds.

Millions have given their lives for Jesus' name's sake. They have surrendered all for the glory of his name. Some live for denomination's sake, for self-interest's sake, for the sake of ease and avarice; but when we rise to become Godlike, we live for his son's sake and are lifted into a position of partnership with God.

When Henry VIII gave Bishop Cranmer his signet ring, it meant that everything the king could do for him was at his disposal. The signet ring of our Lord, with the white stone and the wonderful name written thereon, means that he will supply all our needs, and that whatsoever we ask the Father in that Name, he will give it. E. W. C.

"No Condemnation"

"THERE is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit. For the law of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death." Our sin and our unbelief condemn us, our impenitence and hypocrisy condemn us, our deeds condemn us and our false teachers condemn us with "heresies, even denying God." The law condemns us, for it can only condemn, it cannot save. That deliverance which by our own endeavors is impossible, by the grace of God is ours through faith in His Son, for "he that believeth in Him is not condemned" and He, himself, has said, "He that heareth my word and believeth in him that sent me, hath everlasting life and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life."

Walking with Christ

IN these days of severe trial for the faith, and when so many churches are teaching rationalism rather than religion, we are reminded of an incident related by Dr. Wilbert W. White. In a certain progressive village there was a church which, like many others elsewhere, had a weather vane atop of the spire, with four points bearing gilded letters, N. S. E. W., and veering to each quarter in turn, according to the direction of the wind. A veteran Christian, happening to look up at it on a breezy day, was moved to remark: "When will the church take off that weather vane and let the spire point straight at the stars?"

It was a question which might well have been put not to the church only, but to the church-going masses of America, for it has a direct application to all who name the name of Christ and claim to be his followers. In the old days our church choirs used to sing:

"Ye who the name of Jesus bear,
His sacred steps pursue."

Today, alas, they do not sing it with such emphasis, and too many have forgotten the joy of walking in his footsteps. They are like the weather vane on the church steeple, swaying in every breeze and yielding to every "wind of doctrine." They are deflected from the straight path by every new vagary, and consequently make but little progress in the Christian life. To such impressionable natures change becomes a habit; they are even unhappy if they stay long of one opinion. By turns seemingly sound and reverent, the next day we find them among the doubters; instead of applying in faith to the only real source of guidance, they are disposed to test everything by analytical methods, which never fail to give negative results. And so they live on, spending their time discussing the theories of men and women like themselves, or the merits of some new fad masking under the cloak of religion, instead of associating with God's people and going to his Word for inspiration and spiritual refreshment.

That life which would be molded in Christlikeness must be fixed on Christ and must dwell in his light and atmosphere. It must move around him as the satellites move around the fixed stars. Paul testifies that the light of truth which shone into his soul, transforming his whole life, came not from man nor through human wisdom, but was a straight shaft from that Jesus who is the "Light of the world." We who live in these later days realize that while following Christ "afar off" may be better than not following him at all, yet if we are to be like him, we must get close to his side, where we can see, feel, hear—yes, even touch him, and commune with him in believing prayer. If we take him as our companion we shall not be satisfied to know him at a distance. We feel that we must press nearer and nearer, until he becomes a part of our own life, and that we are his true followers indeed, subject to his will and obedient to his leadership in all things.

Christ can have no rival in the hearts of his true disciples. There is only one Jesus, one Saviour, one fellowship, with him. In this sweet companionship we find it not a sacrifice but a pleasure to lay aside unworthy desires and ambitions, and to have our acts, our words, our very thoughts attuned to his very own. While we walk by his side, false philosophies, vain mysteries and sophistries, blind leaders of the blind, can have no power to charm us from the path which leads to peace of mind and happiness here, and to heaven hereafter.

A Great Scientist Gone

IN the death of Elie Metchnikoff, the scientific world loses one of its foremost figures, who, for nearly thirty years, has attracted attention by his theories concerning health and longevity. It was Metchnikoff's contention that the human machine—the body—under normal conditions, should continue to be serviceable for a much longer period than the average life of man. Indeed, he even asserted that, with the destructive bacteria eliminated and amid agreeable and wholesome surroundings, men should rival the patriarchs and live anywhere from 100 to 150 years. His views on such modification of living conditions as would postpone the natural processes of decay were discussed by scientists everywhere, and the introduction of Bulgarian bacilli as a defense against destructive microbes may be said to have established a new school of medical treatment, for a time at least. Yet his researches did not avail in his own case, since he has not lived beyond the "allotted span" of three-score and ten. However, Metchnikoff's fame is not dependent upon any one particular line of research, for he labored with success in many fields. His discovery of the function of the protective leucocyte, or white corpuscle, in the human body opened a new and fruitful field of investigation to all who were interested in working out the problem of immunity from disease. In this field he was the pioneer. Investigations on other lines have added to his fame as a benefactor of suffering humanity, and his name will be linked with those of Virchow, Pasteur, Pfeiffer, Wright, and other eminent investigators, whose labors have added largely to the sum of human health and happiness.

Justice to the Farmer

CONGRESS has passed the Rural Credits Bill and it has received the President's signature. It is one of the most satisfactory measures of the session, and lifts from the shoulders of the farmers a burden they have borne too long. As the Christian Herald has repeatedly shown, the banking laws and banking interests have discriminated unfairly against the agriculturists in imposing excessive rates of interest on loans. The new bill does away with the extortions of the past, and places the farmer on an equal footing with other borrowers. It is a measure of justice long delayed, and those who have fought the farmers' cause in Congress have well earned their gratitude. It is a striking commentary on our business methods that the greatest food-raising country should have been the last to recognize the right of the men who raise the crops and feed the nation to fair play in business.

But there is something further due to the farmer than the establishment of a satisfactory rural credit system. Above all other workers, he is subject to risks, losses, depletions and reductions in the results of his labor. He may face stoically the losses that come through droughts and which proceed from other causes beyond his control. But the occasional toll they take of his substance is light in comparison with the constant drain it suffers at the hands of the grain speculators and the middlemen, who, as accurate statistics disclose, take from 41 to 78 per cent. of the price the farmer receives for his oats, exclusive of the cost of handling, the consumer as a result paying 110 per cent. over the price received by the producer. This is true also, though in a somewhat less degree, as to wheat and corn. In all he raises for the market the farmer has to submit to being victimized at one end of the game, and the consumer at the other end, while the enterprising handler and the wideawake speculator, by forcing prices down while buying and up while selling, make a handsome profit at both ends. This is the new problem that must next be dealt with, and it is one for which not Congress but the states must find a practical and business-like solution.

A Pointed Question

EMPEROR WILLIAM of Germany has a habit of saying startling things. At a recent meeting of army chaplains (according to a statement in the Vossiche Zeitung, cabled from Amsterdam) he is reported to have made a characteristic address in the course of which he likened the world war to the sifting of the chaff from the wheat. He warmly commended practical Christianity. Then he suddenly asked his audience:

"Suppose Christ entered at this moment through yonder door. Could we look into his face? Going to church once a week is not enough. We must make him the ideal of our practical life; we must determine to live according to his teaching. You must bring sharply before us the vision of God, who perhaps, as the Judge, is now passing through the world. You must represent him and show him to us. . . . The men who are now in the trenches will return home different men spiritually from when they left. Impress upon them that they must retain in the future the thoughts which fill them now."

It is perhaps not surprising that the suggestion of Christ in bodily presence, viewing the world as it is today, should occur to many serious and thoughtful minds in a time of stress and struggle. Doubtless thousands have had the same idea. It would seem to be a logical product of the strenuous influences that are now at work throughout the world. Yet all do not regard it with equal complacency, and many doubt whether he would be welcome, were he to revisit the earth today. Perhaps the most striking presentation of this view of the case is given by Rev. Mercer G. Johnston, rector of Trinity Episcopal Church, Newark, N. J., in the Forum for August. We give the essential passages:

> Speaking as a Christian fully affiliated with organized Christianity, I state it as my carefully considered conviction that the greatest possible embarrassment to organized Christianity in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and teen would be the reincarnation and reappearance on e h of Jesus Christ. The bodily presence of Jesus Christ on e h in the twentieth century would be almost if not quite as barrassing to the Christian Church as his bodily presence o arth in the first century. To many who profess and call the lves Christians and who are conspicuously identified wi our Christian churches, the reign of Jesus Christ on eart oday would be regarded as a reign of terror. They would " eedingly fear and quake" at the bare suggestion of such an o nous possibility.
> I would hesitate to say, just at this moment, that th odily presence of Jesus Christ would be an embarrassm t to European Christianity. Possibly it would not be now. here are those who say that Christ is coming to broken- rted Europe, walking upon the sea of blood, and that Eu e is readier to receive him than she has ever been. But in t case of American Christianity, there can be no doubt ab the matter. Here, Jesus Christ would be an awful embarra ent! Our mammonized brand of Christianity would not tand for him!

While both the German Kaiser and the Am ican pastor may be perfectly sincere in their convi ons, we feel that the great body of earnest Chr ians throughout the world believe that, in such an nergency as has been described, probably the firs ommand to issue from the Saviour's lips would l that war should cease, and that men should stop the ked slaughter of their fellow men. It is unimaginab that he would pass by, uncondemned, the inhuman st ggle which has claimed millions of victims and plung the world in sorrow and suffering, or that he ould withhold his condemnation of all who were resp sible for the war, whatever their nationality.

Tolstoi, in his beautiful story of "The Visio of a Russian battlefield, expressed this idea most i ressively. The Christ, even in his deep sorrow an ity, still had strong words of condemnation for tho who stirred up war. Yet he sought rather to win th by love and kindness to the recognition of the un rsal Fatherhood of God and the love which each wed to his fellow man. It was as though he had s l, as he did long ago on Calvary, "Father, forgive em; they know not what they do."

Pass the Anti-Child Labor Law

JUST what kind of a man it is who would seek to ruct the passage of a Federal act tending to do away h the evils of child labor is hard to conjecture. We pose these gentlemen have little children of their own; we pose they would not like to have their tender bodies crushe nder the burden of factory work; we suppose that in their ding at family prayers they have sometimes come upon th ords "Whoso shall offend one of these little ones, it were b r for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and at he were drowned in the depths of the sea."

Rejoicing over the passage of the Anti-Child Labo ill in the House some time ago, a bill which forbade in state commerce in goods manufactured in whole or in t by children, was changed to grief and anger when it was fo that the Senate had refused to ratify the bill. The matter e up again at the present congressional session, and action on it has been delayed until now that Congress is ready to burn President Wilson brought the matter to congressio and public notice by walking into the capitol the other and insisting that the Senate ratify and pass this bill efore adjournment.

The plea that this is a matter for state and not fo deral legislation will not stand. It is the duty of the Federal vernment to protect American life. So it is one of its most el ental and fundamental duties to protect the lives of Americ children from those interests which seek to weaken and stroy them. It is to be earnestly hoped that those senatorial tructionists who have been seeking to delay the passage thi sane and righteous measure will no longer dare to def ublic opinion, which is aroused at last both to the moral and e omic necessity of safe-guarding childhood.

The Treacherous Water

THAT mother of blessed memory who told Johnny could go swimming if he wouldn't go near the water s not as foolish as Johnny thought her to be. She bel ed to the original Safety-First Society. She had gained wisd from experience and she knew the safe side of the strand. h the advent of real summer the Monday morning papers a again chronicling the usual week-end drownings, and the dr nings occur in the same old ways. If people were finding n way of getting drowned we might feel that there was som stification in it, but they don't. The strong swimmer w goes beyond the life lines and the floats and almost out of ht o the beach guards is still seized with the sudden cram Th fellow who rocks the boat or who rows into the swell of a ssing steamer, the people who change seats in the middl f th stream or who venture in canoes on storm-swept lakes c ivers the boy who wades into the deep hole in the shallow c k, a these pay their toll to the cold grip of the merciles ate What then? Shall we have no fun at all? By no mea Bu let us use our experience and such good sense as the eato may have been pleased to bless us with, and omit th akin of these foolish chances. Let us not presume upon ou kill o our good fortune. Let us use the water wisely and not emp to paddle a canoe when we have scarcely learned pol a punt.

oncerning Ice-Cream

MANY persons think that Dolly Madison invented ice-cream, but hy Samter Winslow, writing in the lus ated World, declares that Dolly Madison was merely the first person to serve it in America. This was at a White House reception during the administration of President Madison. The guests liked ice-cream so well that they asked how it was made, and from this small beginning the ice-cream business has grown until, according to a creamery expert who has followed the development of the business in America, the American people last year consumed 250,000,000 gallons, which, figured at 80 cents a gallon, means a business of $200,000,000. The first ice-cream was made by a London confectioner named Gunton, and from him others learned to make it, and it was introduced to America by Dolly Madison. But his methods of freezing were crude and uncertain. It remained for Nancy Johnson, the wife of an American naval officer, to invent the ice-cream freezer. Today the ice-cream business has outgrown the small freezer. Vast quantities are frozen by special machinery. The industry has become so great that fortunes have been made out of it. And every year it increases. During the last ten years the consumption of ice-cream in the United States doubled. It is claimed that an average of sixty dishes of ice-cream were consumed by every man, woman and child last year. They had a great many delicious articles of food in olden times, but nothing answering to our ice cream. The Hebrews were shepherds and herdsmen and had the richest dairy products for food. There is this reference to them: "And he took butter and milk, and the calf which he had dressed, and set it before them, and he stood by them under the tree, and they did eat." (Gen. 18 : 8.)

Steam Shovel Robin's Home

IN the engineer's room of a steam shovel operating on East Hill, Cincinnati, a robin has built her nest, laid eggs, hatched out a brood of four babies, and is raising them. Next to the crow the robin is our best-known bird. His red breast is only so in name, copied from his English relative the real Robin Redbreast. Our robin—really a thrush—has a brownish yellow breast. The naturalists do not count him handsome but to us he is. It is "pretty is as pretty does." He is so dignified and aristocratic He takes his meals on the gentleman's lawn and if the supply of angleworms is short he will feast in the strawberry patch or in the cherry tree. The true thrush is shy and solitary and builds its nest in the forest, but the robin member of the family is domestic and eminently social in his disposition. He will build his nest on a limb or in the forks of a tree near the house, or under the eaves, or in the sweet-scented honeysuckle vine just against the window, with eggs and mother bird and her mate and little birdies in full sight. What a musician he is! He sings in sunshine and shadow, and sometimes in a storm of rain. Whoever has heard his serenade at early morn, or in the top of the tree at twilight, can never forget it. He is a dull scholar in nature's school who does not feel happier when the robin comes from the south in the spring, and sadder when he goes back to his realm of flowers in the autumn. It was an odd thing for the robins to build their nest in the steam shovel, and yet they are original and often make their home in queer places. There is a record of one on the top of a long pole which stood in an open barnyard; of another built in a milk-house on the side of a barrel just over the heads of the men, who rattled the huge milk-cans and worked the squeaking pump overtime without disturbing the birds. The nearest to the one in the steam shovel is one of which Audubon tells which built within a few feet of a blacksmith's anvil. The little birds loved and trusted the hard workmen on the shovel, and knew they would not hurt them or their birdies for the world. The building of birds' nests in strange places is thus referred to: "The sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosts, my King and my God." (Ps. 84 : 3.)

Exhaustion of Oil Supply

AT a meeting of automobile engineers held recently, Dr. W. F. Rittman said: "We burn in the form of fuel, to replace coal, about 25 per cent. of the crude oil that comes from the ground. We use another 25 per cent. in the form of gas oils to make gas, where coal could be used with equal ease in a by-product oven. We use 25 per cent. of the crude oil in internal combustion engines. If we could take the crude oil at one-fourth the present rate, make it all into gasoline and use coal for fuel for the other purposes as it should be used, then the exhaustion of our oil would not be a question of twenty-five years, it would be a question of seventy-five years." We killed our forests for fuel and other purposes, not having sense enough until recently to replant them. If the supply of oil is to be so short as Dr. Rittman suggests, it might be well for the industrial world to adjust itself to the facts. There are alarmists who are afraid that all of our natural resources will be exhausted, and some of them figure how difficult it will be to have sufficient food, clothing and fuel for the future. Only the surface of the world's natural resources has been scratched. God has stored up an abundance for the future generations, and science will continue to discover and make use of it in the support, labor and happiness of the race. The words meant for the individual can be applied to the nation and the race: "My God shall supply all your need." (Phil. 4 : 19.)

Being Blind He Saw

AT a recent meeting of the West New Jersey Presbytery at Woodbury Heights a most tender and impressive service was enjoyed at the dinner hour when the presence of Dr. Charles S. Barrett, blinded by a sad accident some time since, was noted, and he told of the wonderful vision he had enjoyed of God's care and supporting grace, and of his still being enabled to minister to his people, and of their tender abiding love. The minister has many hardships, but they are transmuted into pleasures by the divine call to duty. No tongue can tell the value of the loyalty and love of parishioners to a minister. Dr. Barrett by his nearness to Christ has clear spiritual vision and realizes the truth of the saying: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." (Matt. 5 : 8.)

Last Survivor of Monitor

DR. GRENVILLA M. WEEKS, who is said to be the last survivor of the crew of the Monitor, called at the White House June 15 to see the President about a design for a building to be erected in Newark, N. J., in commemoration of the 250th anniversary of the founding of that city. Dr. Weeks is in his eightieth year, and made a striking appearance as he stood in the corridor in his Grand Army uniform with his flowing white hair and beard. His right arm hung limp and almost useless. It was the souvenir he had brought from the famous battle between the Monitor and the Merrimac. He carries another wound from a spear thrust received in a land battle in 1864 after he had received a commission as surgeon in the Union Army. After his injury on the Monitor, Dr. Weeks came to Washington to apply for an appointment on the medical staff of the army. Secretary Stanton gave him no encouragement. Dr. Weeks, hearing that Mr. Lincoln was holding a reception, went over to the White House. As he was about to enter the room where the President was receiving, an officer blocked his way and gruffly ordered him down to the end of the line. Mr. Lincoln saw the performance, and calling the doctor back said to the officer on guard, "Major, whether the man be an officer or private soldier, you yourself be a gentleman," separating the syllables of the last word, and emphasizing the first two. Then he said to Dr. Weeks, "You have lost the use of your arm, but you look like you could use your head, and we will make a place for you." As a sailor, surgeon, or honored citizen, Dr. Weeks now at fourscore can appropriately take up these words, which so many in the army of the Lord will sing in spiritual triumph: "I have fought a good fight." (II Tim. 4 : 7.)

The Glory of War?

WHEN the writer was a little boy, men still talked of their recent experiences in the Civil War. And one day, after listening to his father tell of the enthusiasm as the volunteers marched off to the front, he, with that vociferous patriotism which is the nature of the small boy, exclaimed fervidly how he too would like to go to war.

His father, evidently sensing the fact that his own word-picture had been perhaps too vivid for the good of childish years, asked him why he seemed to like it so much. And the boy spoke of the uniforms, the fifes and the drums, the cheering of the crowds as the troops marched by. Whereupon the father exclaimed, "But that is not war. That's just parading." And then he painted a picture of war—real war—that the boy has never forgotten—a picture of how just after a battle he was sent with canteens strung over his shoulder to get water which he was to bring back to the hospital tent. On the way back he passed along a road, the sides of which were lined with dead and wounded men. As he walked along, the wounded ones rose up as far as they were able, holding out their arms entreatingly, begging for some water. Of course, he had been sent to bring that water back to the hospital, and so he marched grimly and unheedingly along until finally one man rose bloodily up on his knees, which was as far as he could get, and holding up his hands beseechingly cried out, "In the name of Christ Jesus, give me a drink!"

He got it.

That was a picture of war, the horror of which has never been forgotten by the writer. It was a picture which hovered in the background of his mind when he traveled through the stricken countries of Europe for the Christian Herald. For, after all, is not the condition of Europe and the Near East exactly that same picture on a larger scale? Invading armies have pushed forward and back over the stricken countries, always leaving the roads and fields filled with dead and dying soldiers. Worse than this—filled with widows and orphans, who are figuratively crying out to the people of the United States: "In the name of Christ Jesus, come to our aid!"

IT has been said that the charity of America for the sufferers of the European War has been the most lavish ever known in the history of the world. And under ordinary circumstances, the contributions seem like a large sum to give for charity. But when we consider that there must be over a million widows and orphans in Poland alone; over a million in France; that there are at least half a million in Belgium; half a million Belgian refugees in Holland; a quarter of a million in England; perhaps a million widows and orphans in Serbia; and so many in Armenia and in Palestine—where the precepts of the Prince of Peace first found voice—that they appal us—when we consider that the money contributed by the United States for the support of these millions is on the average not more than a few cents for each citizen of this country; and when, on the other hand, we remember that the people of the United States have profited, directly or indirectly, to the extent of millions upon millions of dollars through the sale of the very ammunition which has created the maimed, the halt and the blind, who populate Europe today, and the widows and orphans who will carry the suffering of this war for decades to come, then we should be ashamed at our poor showing.

This was one of the Christian Herald relief camps that ministered to the refugee Servians

The writer has traveled through Europe during this war and has already told something of the sufferings which came under his observation. But let us go farther afield and look into the condition of the people who are starving in Armenia. Most horrible stories have come to us from Armenia. There can be no doubt that Armenians were deported by the wholesale, because Ambassador Henry Morgenthau vouches for the fact. There can be no doubt that this deportation was enforced under the most cruel circumstances. In large areas of Turkey, the houses of all Armenians were searched for weapons, the men were driven into the mountains and butchered, the women, many of them with babies born and unborn, were driven into the desert, where thousands died of neglect and starvation. It is a tale of beatings, impalings, disembowelings, the details of which are too sickening to relate.

The Christian Herald has actual evidence of the driving out of these people in the piteous appeals of the American Armenians to use its influence to get them news of their dead and dying relatives in the Near East, and in the replies which were sent to the Herald from the American embassy in Constantinople. Two families in particular of which we were asked to inquire were the Mandalian and Ask families. In a letter which we received from the American embassy the following information was included:

> During the deportation last fall, he with his immediate family managed to escape from the train and, with a few timely bribes, got left behind.
> The father, Garabet, and the mother, Dirouhi Mandalian, were both sent to the desert of Der Zor; no news has been received from them for five or six months.
> The brothers Armenag, Lot, Abraham and Stepan Mandalian, were all taken as soldiers; nothing has been heard from them since. Their families were sent to Der Zor.
> Sister Yeranouhi Apigian and her husband, Hagopig, are in Eski-Cheir.
> The grandmother, Sinem Hadji Lazarian, the uncles, Zareh, Ghazer, Haghig Hadji Lazarian, and the aunt Zarouhi Hadji L rian, were all sent to th esert of Der Zor; no ne has been received fron hem since last fall.
> Hovhannes Mand an is in Konia; his mother erip- sima Mandalian, ghty-five years of age, hi ister, Nuvart, and her child all died in Koni after having spent the night in a hail a rain storm.
> The family of Mr. Ask, inquired bout evidently means the Eskian family of C djik. Of that family, Hovhannes Eskian is Constantinople. Demotris and Meg litch Eskian with their families were sent Der Zor: nothing has been heard from th for months.

Questions and Answers

E. S. T., Carrollton, Ill. It has often been charged that practically all the evidence in support of the accuracy of the Gospel record of the birth, mission and crucifixion of Jesus comes from Christian, and therefore interested sources, and that secular and non-Christian writers are practically silent on the subject. This, however, is very far from the truth. No fact or personality is better attested than the fact and personality of Jesus Christ. Tacitus, the historian, in his Annals (XV: 44) refers to him: Pliny Secundus, another Roman writer of the first century, also refers to him. Both of these writers, in addition to being historians, were officials in the service of imperial Rome in the first century, and they had the opportunity of a contemporary knowledge of the subject. Lucian, a noted secular writer of the middle of the second century, writes explicitly of the crucifixion. The works of both Suetonius and Eusebius contain references to Christ. There are still other secular writers who might be referred to. It is not necessary, however, to go to any secular or pagan source for corroboration of the Gospel narrative, or of the fact that the one single central personality—Jesus—was born, lived, taught and suffered here on earth. It is well known to Jewish theologians throughout the world today, and to not a few well-read students of Christianity, that the Gemara, one of the Talmudical records which dealt largely with the contemporary ecclesiastical history of the time in which it was written, contained an account of the birth, parentage, teaching, accusation, trial, testimony, conviction and execution of Jesus, written in terms of condemnation, but the value of which as an actual, though a hostile, record is conclusive. It was spread in full in every Talmud until 1630, when a World Synod of Jewish ecclesiastics, assembled at Jaroslav, in Little Poland, issued a decree that, to avert Gentile hostility and persecution, all reference to Jesus of Nazareth should thenceforth be omitted from the Talmudical books, and a circle substituted in the place thereof, which, as the decree explained, the initiated would understand. In the Talmudical books today, only the circle marks the place where the record once stood. The editor, however, once had in his hands an ancient copy of the Babylonian Talmud (printed in Amsterdam in 1645) which contained the record in full; giving even the names and testimony of the witnesses at the trial.

R. C., Canton, Ohio. Should a boy of sixteen try to win souls?

It would be unwise to discourage any boy or girl who feels the impulse to win souls for Christ. So long as there is normal health and sanity and a cheery, courageous desire to be helpful, there is no reason why boys and girls should not be efficient soul-winners, particularly among their own companions. As a general rule, however, these impulses do not come till later in life. We notice even in the life of Jesus that he did not actually begin his public ministry till he was about thirty years of age. He followed the normal lines of growth, increasing "in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man" (Luke 2 : 52). The incident of his conversation with the wise men in the Temple seems to stand alone; there is no indication that he habitually took the part of leader in religious discussions and observations. It is more important to lay the foundations of strong, sound, normal thinking and pure living, to increase one's store of information, and to grow in religious knowledge and experience, than to engage in advanced Christian work. Children should be urged to come close to Christ; to let his pure gladness into their souls. As they live their sunny, helpful lives they will be a constant testimony to the grace and goodness of God. And as they feel inclined to tell others of their love for Christ and to invite them to accept his salvation their words and efforts will be blessed and made effective.

Heart-Broken Wife and Mother, Oregon. When a Christian is in deep trouble and forgives those who have wronged him and, though fully believing that all things are possible with God, yet at times fears that God may for some unknown reason not grant the desire of his heart, is that Christian lacking in faith? Is that occasional fear liable to hinder the answer of the prayer when that answer would be a benefit to others, bringing loved ones back to Christ and building up a Christian home?

There is surely a sad and terrible story back of this pathetic letter. The first necessity is to throw the whole of your great burden on your still greater Lord. Of course, these times of fear are lapses from faith, but you must not allow yourself to be disturbed by them. If you worry about them they will become stronger and more frequent. You must not try to have faith in your faith, but to have faith in God. Believe that he is going to do all that can be done about it, and that as you trust him he will show you how you can help him answer your own prayer. Another thing you must keep firmly in mind is that when we pray for others they still have their independent power of will. God does not save people against their will. All we can pray for is that God will do everything in his power to induce them to return to him and to righteousness, and show us what we ourselves can do in the matter. Above all, strive to keep a cheerful heart. The winsomeness of a trusting, cheery experience will do more than anything else to bring the wanderers back to ourselves and to our Saviour.

Mrs. M. M. B., Montana. The passage you mention can have no possible bearing on the situation you describe. As to that situation itself, it is sometimes necessary for us to give up our insistence upon certain things that are not in themselves fundamental for the sake of winning others to Christ. Paul himself was more than willing to do this. In I Cor. 9 : 19-22 he tells how he is willing to be "made all things to all men," that he "might by all means save some." The church custom you refer to seems to be based upon a passage in Paul's writing that refers to a special time and place rather than forming a command for all Christians of all times. It may be that the Lord would wish you to give up your adherence to this particular custom in order that you might win your dear ones to him. Above all, keep a sunny, trustful, helpful, winsome disposition, endeavoring by cheerful kindness to draw your friends closer to the Master.

L. A. E., Boonville, Ind. There are two groups of Friends or Quakers. Those of the Orthodox group accept the regular orthodox doctrines of the other Christian denominations. In the early part of the nineteenth century Elias Hicks, a religious teacher denied the divinity and the atonement of Christ and the authenticity and divine authority of the Holy Scriptures. Many Friends followed his teachings, and his followers are still known as Hicksites. Both groups of Friends emphasize the "Inner Light," believing that the Holy Spirit gives direct guidance for words and actions.

Putting Sun and River to Work

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

SINCE I have come to Canada I have acquired a contempt for Aladdin. At every step here I am meeting common, everyday men who are enslaving genii a million times mightier than those of the Arabian Nights. They rub the lamps of their genius and palaces of mechanical wonder spring forth almost in a night. They give their orders and change the course of a river. They raise their hands and valleys are turned upside down. They even send their minions into the stony ice vaults that have been locked since the age of the glaciers to bring forth the gold so long held by Jack Frost.

I have already written of the Yukon Gold Company, the child of the Guggenheims, which is operating in the creeks that have poured millions into the lap of the world. My subject today is Joseph W. Boyle, the dredge king, whose dominions are forty square miles of the gold-bearing earth through which the Klondike itself cuts its way. His territories begin within almost a stone's throw of where the river flows into the Yukon, and they run to beyond Hunker Creek for a distance of about seven miles. They cover altogether an area of over 25,000 acres, and the most of this is mixed with nuggets, grains, dust and flour of fine gold.

The tract is known as the Boyle Concessions. It consists of leases from the government of Canada giving Mr. Boyle the right to work the lower valley of the Klondike up to the crest of the mountains on both sides of the river. The greater part of it is in the wide bed between the hills through which the fast-flowing Klondike runs. When Mr. Boyle got the property the people declared that all of the gold had been won and that the land would never be fit for anything else than moose pastures.

Mr. Boyle thought otherwise. He reasoned, "If so much gold has come from the valley and the creeks running into it, there cannot but be quantities of gold dust and grains scattered through the bedrock of which the valley is made." He went upon that supposition and got the concessions and as a result he is potentially one of the very rich men of the world.

"JOE BOYLE" is the title by which he goes here. He has no frills about him, and though everyone pays him respect, in manner and thought he is as plain as a pipestem. I wish you could see him. He is the personification of the combative. A giant of a man, he is straight and well formed. He is broad-shouldered, big-framed, stands six feet in his stockings and weighs more than 200 pounds. He has a big head, a broad and high forehead and eyes like blue steel. His appearance is that of a fighter, and he does not belie him. His jaw is of iron and its grip is grim death. He is a positive man. He knows what he wants and how to demand it. He is a good companion and hail fellow well met with those whom he likes. I am told that he is also a good hater and human throughout. He stands well with his employees, and addresses each of them by his first name. In speaking of him they refer to him as "Joe Boyle" or "J. W. B." but they understand that he is the boss and that everything must be done just as he says.

This pan contains $6,000 worth of gold—one day's output. If you don't believe it, ask "J. W. B." standing just back of Mr. Carpenter

Joe Boyle has had to fight all of his life, and today he would rather fight than do anything else. He began his fight as a boy. His father was a horse farmer in eastern Canada. When J. W. B. had reached seventeen this life grew too tame for him and he started out to make his own way. His success was not great, and when a sea captain asked him to go before the mast he became a sailor and as such traveled over a great part of the world. He was wrecked several times, and in going from the Island of St. Helena around the Cape of Good Hope his ship sprang a leak and the men had to work the pumps for 4,000 miles from there to Bombay.

A little later he struck out for the West, and when some of the first gold mines of the Yukon were discovered he was in Seattle.

Joe Boyle was twenty-eight years old at this time. He did not do as well as he had hoped at mining, and he conceived the idea that there was a fortune to be made in the earth after the miners had left, and also in the timber that then covered a great part of the Klondike valley. It was as far back as 1899 when he stood on a little hill above the Klondike river and debated as to the size of the tract he would lease. He determined to take all of the land within sight, and then made out the papers for the gold territory which he now has.

He also made a claim for the timber. The latter was ten miles in length, extending through and beyond the territory which he is now mining. Every one laughed at the mining property, but he had to fight for his timber. As soon as his application was known his competitors at Dawson saw the authorities and had them require him to stake out the whole ten miles of his property. This was when the claim was just on the edge of being perfected, and the announcement was made at 3 o'clock in the afternoon before the last day required. Boyle started on foot that afternoon and tramped all night, blazing his way and marking the limits. He had to wade through swamps, blaze the trees and drive stakes. The work was exhausting, but he kept on until he thought he had marked out not less than fifteen miles. He got back to Dawson at 9 o'clock the next morning only to find a number of men ready to jump his claim if it had not been staked. When the claim was measured according to law, it was found that his stakes fell short only twenty feet of the ten miles allotted.

It was his lumber profits that gave Mr. Boyle the money that enabled him to go to see capitalists and finance his concessions.

The Boyle concessions include seven miles of the mile-wide Klondike valley and they run to the crest of the hills on each side. The whole territory contains more or less gold.

Mr. Boyle says that the bed of the valley contains about 26 cents' worth of gold to the cubic yard and that it costs on the average about 8 cents a yard to get the gold out. At this estimate the gold in the valley amounts to somewhere between forty and fifty millions of dollars, and this

Fritters with the Real Taste of the Corn

CORN fritters made with Crisco are a tempting delicacy. They are unusually crisp and tender. Try them and you will find that the taste of the rich, sweet sugar corn predominates. Best of all they are not greasy.

CRISCO
For Frying - For Shortening For Cake Making

Crisco gives up its heat so quickly that a rich brown crust forms immediately. This keeps the fat out and the natural flavor in.

Crisco-made fritters are actually baked. They are exceptionally appetizing and more easily digested.

Crisco, purely vegetable, has neither taste nor odor. Such wholesome results follow its use that fritters and other toothsome fried foods have been restored to favor in countless thousands of homes.

Corn Fritters

Something that will add to the enjoyment of any meal

Green corn off cob or one can corn
1 tablespoonful melted Crisco
1 cupful flour
1 egg
1 teaspoonful baking powder
2 teaspoonfuls salt
¼ teaspoonful white pepper
3 tablespoonfuls milk

(Use level measurements)

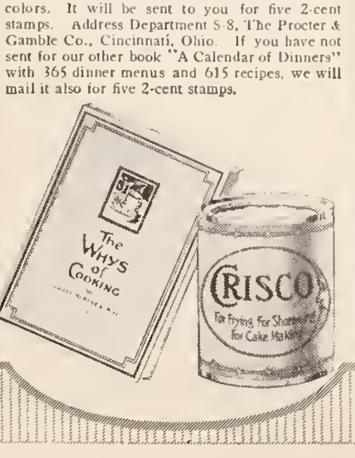
Put corn in bowl with melted Crisco, add flour and slightly beaten egg, then baking powder and salt and pepper; then add milk if mixture is quite thick. If not omit the milk. The consistency depends on the corn. Drop by spoonfuls on Criscoed griddle and fry until brown on both sides. Serve piping hot.

"The Whys of Cooking"

Janet McKenzie Hill's new book sent for five 2-cent stamps

Every housewife should secure "The Whys of Cooking", latest addition to the Crisco Library, written by Janet McKenzie Hill of the Boston Cooking School and editor and publisher of American Cookery. The book deals with many vital problems of successful housekeeping. "Why bake bread in small loaves?" "Why set vegetables to cook in boiling water?" "Why is pastry sometimes greasy and crumbly?" and hundreds of other important questions are asked and answered. Besides these it contains 150 new recipes and the Story of Crisco. Illustrated in colors. It will be sent to you for five 2-cent stamps. Address Department S-8, The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, Ohio. If you have not sent for our other book "A Calendar of Dinners" with 365 dinner menus and 615 recipes, we will mail it also for five 2-cent stamps.



tremendous sum is free gold in the shape of flour, dust and small nuggets scattered through the earth in such infinitesimal quantities that the output of a wagon load is not as big as a pinch of your fingers. The most of the gold lies as far from the surface of the earth as the height of a three or four story house, and with the exception of a foot or so of moss and muck on the top the material consists of gravel, the stones ranging in size from boulders of quartz and granite as big as a peck measure down to pebbles the size of a pea and even fine sand. In many places this material under the moss is frozen solid as though it were one great block of ice, the boulders, pebbles and sand being cemented together more tightly than the nuts in peanut brittle; and in this frozen mass is found the gold.

IN the rich creeks where the Guggenheims have been operating the earth carries values to the amount of 60 or 70 cents' worth of gold to the ton. It pays to thaw the ice out by steam, but this can be done only at a cost of about 30 cents to the ton. In the Boyle concessions, where the earth carries only 26 cents' worth of gold, some other method of thawing had to be found, for the steam-point process would cost four cents more per ton than the possible output. Mr. Boyle studied the problem and decided to make the sun and the river do his work for him. He found that if he could get rid of the muck and the moss, the great non-conductor that covered the frozen mass, the sun would gradually make its way down to bedrock. It would thaw the earth to a depth of ten feet in the summer and the next winter's freezing would make solid only about six feet of this thawing. He found that when the next summer came the sun would poke its rays through the six feet of the ice made in the last winter and then jump through the thawed ground left from the last summer and melt four or five feet more of the ancient ice strata below. In short, if the moss could be taken away, the sun would melt its way to bedrock.

Then came the question how to get the muck off at a price that would pay. Here the forces of nature about him were again brought to bear on the question. He found that the Klondike itself would serve for this job. All that he had to do was to dam it in places and turn the course of the river this way and that. The current soon washed off the moss and the muck and when turned again left the gravel just right for the work of the sun.

The next process was to handle the melted material with such economical machinery that not an ounce of energy or a cent of expense went to waste. He investigated the subject of dredges and had some of the largest of these machines that have ever been built made for the purpose. He then brought them in pieces by sea to Skagway and carried them over the mountains and down the Yukon to Dawson and put them to work. His dredges each cost in the neighborhood of a half million dollars apiece and he has three of them, which are now lifting up the bed of the Klondike valley and turning it, as it were, upside down. The dredges gouge out the earth to a depth of thirty or forty feet, taking up rock of all sorts, from boulders as big as a half-bushel basket to earth as fine as the flour of which mushroom crackers are made. They lift this stuff in great steel buckets at a ton to the bucket, to the height of a six-story house, and pour it through revolving screens, so that the rock, gravel and sand are carried away, and every bit of the gold is caught in layers of cocoanut matting not unlike that used on an office-room floor. At the close of each twenty-four hours the mats containing the gold are lifted out and washed in a tub. The gold and black sand fall to the bottom and the mats are put back again.

I despair of describing the dredges. Each is as big as a seven-story block. It is 130 feet long and sixty feet wide, and it weighs 2,000 tons. The machinery is of manganese steel, althou is inclosed in a wooden fra made on the ground.

The Girls of Northfield

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER,

DID you ever see a picture—perhaps in a famous gallery, perhaps on a magazine cover, perhaps only a newspaper cut—that thrilled you utterly? Did you ever see some picture that made a special grip on your heartstrings, that gave a certain tug at the very chords of your soul? Did you study that picture, and then dream over it?

When you went away from that picture what was it that you specially remembered? I am sure that the special thing was the appealing foreground—the beggar woman, the tiny children, the soldier—whatever the foreground was. Probably you never gave the background a second thought—except that it was pleasant, and that it was charmingly drawn, and that it fitted in with the rest of the picture!

It seems to me that that is how most folk who attend one or another of the great summer religious gatherings must feel. It's the way I feel about Northfield, as though it were the beautiful background of a still more beautiful spiritual picture. I attended the Girls' Conference, and the foreground of this picture is a group of girls, laughing and singing and praying in God's own sunlight. That's the part of the picture that made its appeal to me—that's the part of the picture that pulled at my heartstrings and touched the depths of my very soul.

THEY'RE very real girls, all of them. I discovered that when I first arrived, for before I saw any of them I heard them in the distance cheering. It had been field day, and the ones who had been victorious in races and track events were coming home. I shall never forget my first glimpse of them together—rosy-cheeked, vigorous young women who walked well, with heads thrown back and shoulders squared, and arms linked. As they drew nearer I saw that their sport clothes were very correct and well fitting. They didn't look so much like students at a conference as like figures from one of the society pages of a newspaper. But as they came nearer—very near—I saw the difference. For in their eyes I could see a quality that one doesn't always see in the pictured eyes on the society page. That quality was soul!

One of the girls attending the conferences had been a schoolmate of mine in the days when we wore white pinafores and pigtailed hair. She it was who introduced me to the girls—the New York delegation—that I roomed with. It was she who pointed out where the Spring Street delegation was stopping (Spring Street is perhaps the most unattractive part of our city's lower West Side); it was she who told me that there were groups of schoolgirls from Boston and Philadelphia and Baltimore. It was she who told me of the Girls' Camp in the woods where working girls are able to have vacations for a small amount of money.

The conference had been going on for about a week when I arrived. The girls by that time were all friends, firm friends, and I felt out of it at first—but only just at first. After a bit I met the New York Girl, and the Spring Street Girl, and the Missionary from China, and the Trained Nurse from Boston. And then I felt at home, too. For they told me intimate personal little things that were not like the confidences of total strangers.

"I'm not very busy at home," said the New York Girl rather apologetically. "I don't do half what I ought to. I only have a Bible class, and a gymnasium class, and a sewing class. The last two are among the poorer children of our congregation. Of course a sewing class and a gymnasium class are not very big items in a religious way, but they help the girls."

Not very big items in a religious way, a sewing class and a gymnasium class. And yet the sewing done in that little class will help to keep homes together, maybe; will help these young girls to be efficient wives and mothers. And the gymnasium class will help build up their poor little bodies that the slums of our city hav to destroy—bodies that God them. Not very big—in a way? I wonder.

THE Spring Street Girl wa notes in chapel one day spied her. Her sensitive, delic face was bent low over her n and her small, slender finger their efforts to keep up with th After the benediction I hurri side.

"Now that you have thes I questioned, "how are you make use of them?"

That brave Balti- girl had not wanted to speak— did! And her little talk had others the way. She had not to speak, but that little speech l that some of her friends had remind them of her.

, life at best is rather uncertain. always the old, weary, tired life the first to go. Sometimes it's g gay life, sometimes it's a careless life, that is called from this world. Sometimes the voice that is stilled is the voice that said, "I can't do it—not this time!"

What if that girl hadn't made her little speech—her speech that proved an epoch in so many lives? What if she had put it off until some other time? For the other time never came. Sometimes, all too often, other times don't come!

THE last meeting was a wonderful meeting. I think that I shall always remember it. It was a meeting when a number of girls—some of them still very young—gave their testimony for Christ. It was an intensely religious, remarkably earnest meeting, without being either dramatic or emotional. The girls just stood up, very calmly and simply, and told us that they loved God and were willing to serve him. It was hard, for some of the girls were young and shy; but one couldn't help feeling that they wanted to talk—that they were glad to.

I spoke to one of the girls in the New York delegation after the meeting. She had told us, very sweetly and convincingly, what her religion meant to her.

"Your little talk was wonderful," I said.

The girl laid her hand on my arm, and I was conscious of the soul that shone in her eyes—the soul that I had noticed that first day in other eyes.

"That wasn't wonderful," she told me; "why, I just said what I felt. It was the most natural thing in the world to do!"

THAT is the secret of it all. Religion is natural to the girls at Northfield—as natural as breathing and sleeping—as natural as rain and sunshine. They aren't afraid of criticism or ridicule; they aren't afraid of anything; for they love God, and they are sure of themselves!

It isn't the big summer religious gathering that makes the girl; it's the girls (and others) and their high ideals that make the Northfields and Winonas and Genevas what they are. With the right atmosphere and the great ideals your own town or city can be a Silver Bay. You can make a religious center of a sun-scorched prairie, and you can get inspiration in a small farming community.

Yes, Northfield is a beautiful place, with its tall trees and its green fields and its sun-dressed river. But after all it's only the background of the real picture; and the real picture is the picture of a group of laughing, singing, praying girls.

Girls and women, make such a place in your own town or city or community! Make a small Northfield in your church or your Sunday school class. Don't be afraid to go ahead; don't shrink before ridicule or criticism. If your religion is real enough there won't be any ridicule or criticism.

Those words of the Bible- ept ringing in Kim's ears all day "The time of death is like the when a man enters the prison it is too late for repentance. it be tonight? Who knows? t and believe today."

even the market-place could that sound. It so interfered with dulgences of the day that Kim able to mount his donkey without Still, there was something ringing ears besides the colporteur's and by the time his donkey was climbing the ascent circling the the hill that overhangs the river, vas fast asleep. His donkeyship by the dropped reins and the e of the refrain: "Era! Era!" e was free to take his time and his road.

-way up the slope was a hawthorn rew at the edge of the road horizontally outward from the cliff, over the river. Now there is nothing so sweet to Korean donkey lips as hawthorn leaves. One nibble led to another; those within reach having all been enjoyed, one forefoot went out onto the trunk and was soon followed by the other. What a treat, and more just ahead! Soon even the hind feet were on the tree. The absence of the swaying motion brought Kim back from dreamland. Opening his eyes he glanced down to the right and saw nothing but sky reflected in the river. He looked down to the left—nothing but white clouds; upward—blue sky. "Where's the earth? Where am I? Have I died and left the earth with no more chance to repent? O God, give me just one more chance on earth and I'll repent once for all. Just one more day, O God!"

The animal, hearing an unusual sound from his master, supposed he was being scolded for his forgetful self-indulgence and did what only a donkey could do in that predicament; he rose on his hind legs, and turning on the narrow trunk, planted his fore-feet on the road and trotted up the hill. Years afterward, when Kim was asked at a Bible conference how he became a convert, he told this story and ended with: "So, you see, I am a Korean Balaam."

1 SNOW JELLY
Half a box of gelatine dissolved in a quart of warm water and beaten to a foam with a half pound of sugar, whites of 3 eggs and the juice of 4 Sunkist Lemons, makes Snow Jelly. Add a custard made of the yolks of the eggs.

2 SUNKIST SHERBET
To one quart of rich milk and two cups of sugar, add juice of three Sunkist Lemons and one Sunkist Orange. Place in freezer and turn steadily until mixture is stiff, then cover closely and let it ripen for about two hours. A slice of orange preserve may be served with each portion, or a few maraschino cherries with their syrup

3 RUSSIAN TEA
Scald the teapot, which should be of earthen or china. Put in three teaspoons of tea, and pour over it three cups of boiling water. Let stand in a warm place to infuse for five minutes. Serve ice-cold with a slice of Sunkist Lemon to each cup, and sugar to taste; or add the pure juice of the Sunkist Lemon and loaf sugar. Some add a maraschino cherry to each cup.

4 SUNKIST LEMON COOKIES
Cream one-half cup of buttter with one cup of sugar, add the juice and grated rind of one-half a Sunkist Lemon and a tablespoon of milk. Sift two scant cups of flour with one-half teaspoon of soda and add to the first mixture alternately, with two well-beaten eggs. Use enough more flour to handle dough lightly, but cookies are best if made quite soft. Roll out into a square or oblong sheet, cut into strips with a sharp knife and bake in a moderate oven.

The Grace of Giving

International Sunday School Lesson for August 13. II Cor. 9

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"In all things I gave you an example, that so laboring ye ought to help the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he himself said, It is more blessed to give than to receive." Acts 20 : 35

This is not the conviction of the majority of people. The world's maxim is to get as much and give as little as possible; because the ordinary belief holds it to be incontestable that the highest bliss of life is in having goods stored up for many years, so that the soul may eat, drink, and be merry. Jesus Christ, on the other hand, boldly contradicted the world's creed in this respect, and said that the majority of men were looking at an inverted picture of realities and saw everything upside down; whereas, if they saw things as he saw them, they would have to acknowledge that the blessedness they had experienced in receiving was not to be compared with what would be theirs if they began to give. The whole question, therefore, is determined by a deeper inquiry as to whether the mind that was in Christ Jesus is also in us. If it is—if the self-life has been judged and crucified, and the divine nature has been allowed to grow and fructify on the soil of the heart, if Christ liveth in us—we shall reach the plane of experience on which he stood when he said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Paul had learnt this lesson of self-giving and was of the same mind as his Master. For this reason these words of our Lord, recorded not in the Gospels, but in the apostolic tradition of the time, were so precious to him; and they have come down to us with the endorsement of myriads. Let us begin to act on them as true, and we shall finally realize their truth.

The Gladness of Giving

By Arthur H. Howland

IF you had made a visit at Minneapolis and then gone to reside for some time in Boston and after a couple of years had written your Minneapolis friends that you were coming to see them again, it is hardly likely that for two thousand years many wise men would discuss learnedly the question whether you might not have gone back to Minneapolis for a short visit in the meantime. But this is what the scholars have been doing in the matter of Paul's visits to Corinth. Luke states plainly the fact of his long residence at Corinth as an inmate first in the home of Aquila and Priscilla and then in the home of Justus (Acts 18 : 1-18). There seems to be good ground for thinking that between that sojourn in Corinth and the writing of the second letter to his friends there, he had made another brief visit. A number of passages are pointed out in the second letter indicating this: II Cor. 12 : 14; 13 : 1; 12 : 21; 2 : 1; 13 : 2. Travel was easy and frequent across the Ægean Sea from Corinth to Ephesus, and Paul might have made this journey without having the fact recorded by Dr. Luke.

Again, there is a question whether or not he wrote three letters instead of two to his Corinthian friends. New Testament scholars are strongly inclined to think there were three, and that one of these letters has been lost. But we have these two beautiful letters remaining to enrich the world's literature. We have had two studies in the first of these letters, and now have a lesson from the second letter. Whether or not Paul himself had been to Corinth in the meantime he had surely sent Titus there (II Cor. 12 : 18). He had expected to meet Titus at Troy (chapter 2 : 12), and was greatly distressed because he did not come with news of the Corinthian church. But when he reached Macedonia Titus met him, doubtless at the city of Philippi, with comforting tidings (5 : 5-16).

The letter may be divided into three parts. The first seven chapters contain some of the deepest and most beautiful of Paul's spiritual teachings. The third, fourth, fifth and sixth chapters, running on to the great climax in the first verse of the seventh chapter, are among the most glorious of all Paul's writings. Notice especially such verses as 3 : 5; 3 : 6; 3 : 17; 3 : 18; 4 : 5; 4 : 6; 4 : 10; 4 : 16-18; 5 : 14-15; 5 : 17; 5 : 20; 5 : 21; 7 : 1.

The second division of the letter consists of chapters 8 and 9, in which Paul speaks of one of the most important items of the errand of Titus at Corinth, namely, the collecting of contributions to form part of the great fund for the destitute Jewish Christians at Jerusalem. The third division, chapters 10 to 13, is somewhat sterner in tone and given chiefly to a defense of the apostle's authority. Some trouble seems to have still lingered in the Corinthian church. Although the wrongdoer whom Paul had rebuked in the first letter had repented and the church had been purged of that stain (2 : 5-8), there were still strifes and divisions and a tendency to resist the authority of their spiritual father. Yet throughout the self-defense of these last chapters a great self-sacrificing love pulsates. "I will very gladly spend and be spent for you, even though the more abundantly I love you the less I be loved." (12 : 15.) His persistent and deepest longing for them is expressed in the ninth verse of the last chapter: "This also we wish, even your perfection."

We turn now to the detail study of the chapter assigned for our special lesson this week, chapter 9. It appears that the Corinthians had become contributors to this Jerusalem fund some time ago; Paul had told the Macedonian Christians that the Corinthians were ready with their contributions a year ago (9 : 2). This fact had helped Paul and his companions in raising contributions in Macedonia, and he begins the 8th chapter by telling the Corinthian Christians how splendidly the Macedonians had been giving. It is interesting in passing to note one of the oddest bits of old English in the whole King James Version of the Scriptures. No speaker or reader of modern English could possibly be expected to understand that the expression, "We do you to wit" (8 : 1) means "we should like to have you know," or as the American Revision interprets, "We make known to you."

Then Titus went to Corinth to get the rest of their contributions, and Paul was a little afraid that the Corinthians might not come up to the expectations which the Macedonian Christians had of them, so he exhorts them to give liberally. These are his arguments: "He that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly, and he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully" (verse 6). Liberal Christians need not be afraid of coming to want, for "God is able to make all grace abound toward you, that ye always having all sufficiency in all things may abound to every good work." He prays that their liberality may be thus rewarded and that they may find themselves "enriched in everything to all bountifulness" (verse 11). Verses 12 to 14 are a little difficult. The apostle points out the various things that their gifts will accomplish. In the first place they will meet the actual needs of destitute Christians. Next they will make many souls grateful to God, thus increasing the volume of praise ascending to him. The recipients will thank God not only for the gifts themselves, but for the proof which this liberality offers of the reality of the Gospel of Christ. It will also awaken in them a real love for these distant unknown friends, who have allowed God's grace to flow through their soul in the form of bountiful and self-sacrificing liberality.

The chapter closes with the joyous oxogy, “Thanks be to God for his nsp kable gift!” This is interpreted t different ways. Some believe at he “unspeakable gift” is the gift ge erosity itself. Surely the gift of a vi generous, unselfish, bountiful ar s the greatest gift God can give a one. But the verse probably r o God's supreme World-Gift, the his Son. Because he made this re e benefaction to us, we must be e o give all we can to others. This gu ent Paul had used in the preceding apter: “For ye know the grace of r rd Jesus Christ, that, though he as h, yet for your sakes he became oor that ye through his poverty igl be rich” (8 : 9).

N ce three other special directions aul makes about giving. The Maceoni Christians had the right idea. he ‘first gave their own selves unto e rd” (8 : 5). Giving that counts th giving that grows out of the concra d life. Christian giving should e r lar. See I Cor. 16 : 2. It should e eerful. Some translators make at ljective “hilarious.” That is the ind f a giver God loves, a giver who nd eal fun in giving. (II Cor. 9 : 7.)

Pa l was anxious about this collec on because he wished to heal the rea between the Jewish and Gentile ing of the church. He knew that the est ay to cure animosities and es an ments is to get people to making er es for one another. Love would ot ly precede but follow the gift. he entile Christians would feel a ee ly tender interest in these Jewish ret'en whom they had helped, and e ws would realize that a religious pe ence which would produce such we nd sacrifice must be genuine. o l l, although he felt specially called o v k among the Gentiles, was glad o b the leader in his practical service o t Jews.

In iscussing this subject of Christian ha y, we must not overlook the more n nental grace of justice. The hu must not make benevolence a substitute for justice. It is said that many of the great fortunes in America can be accounted for by the margin between what the laborers of the industry represented needed and should have gotten for their work and what they actually received. Expert statisticians have figured out that the average American family of two adults and three children needs at least $800 a year to keep them in good physical condition. Yet millions of workers' families receive less than this: some under $500, some $300 and less. The “great captain of industry” who grows rich by keeping back the rightful pay of those who work for him cannot square his accounts either with God or man by giving large sums for charitable, religious and educational purposes. James has some very earnest and terrible words to say to men who have amassed their fortunes in this way in the first verses of the fifth chapter of his epistle. And perhaps the church of Jesus as it is formally organized today has more need for this fundamental lesson of justice than it has for the advanced lesson of benevolence.

Look up the passages in Paul's epistles in which he states that he had supported himself by working at his trade rather than by taking money from the people. He felt that he would have had a perfect right to do this, but he preferred to go to the other extreme and take the time from his spiritual work to support himself by making tents. There is a tendency now to go back to this plan of Paul's. It certainly has much to commend it. The Christian worker may have far greater power and influence in trying to help and save others if it is known that he receives no fee or pay of any kind for his spiritual work.

Christian Herald readers should be specially interested in this Scriptural study of generosity. Their benevolence is known all over the world. The suffering and destitute of many lands through many years have been nourished by their consecrated bounty.

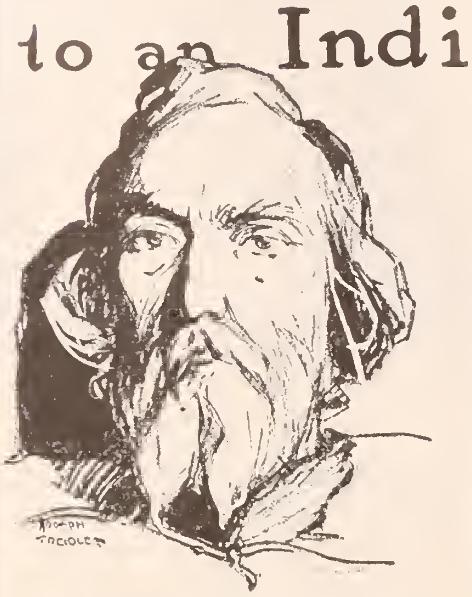
One hundred and sixteen ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including E. P. T., who asks prayer that pastor may be restored to health. Eighty-five friends, for healing for themselves, including A Pastor, that health may be restored, that he may be able to attend to his duties; five friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves or others.

Fifty-three friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Sixty-eight friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.



Pere Marquette
Gave half his hone to an Indian Chief

FATHER Marquette once won the lasting friendship of a powerful Indian Chief by an odd service.

The habit of the Indians was to remove the few hairs of their beards by stoically pulling them out. This Chief had been given a razor by a white trader. He prized it highly but it had grown dull by use.

Marquette gave him half of his own hone and taught him how to use it.

To appreciate a good shaving edge, just travel for a time without one. Twenty miles from a razor is an awkward place for a man with a two days' growth of beard.

Nowadays, a man packs his Gillette in his traveling bag or carries it in his pocket. The sign, “This shop closed on Sundays,” has no terrors for him.

The Gillette is almost as universal as the comb and brush. When you spend a week-end at a modern house you find a Gillette on your dressing table as part of your bathroom fittings.

The Gillette shave is velvet-smooth, no matter how wiry the beard or tender the skin. A keen, fresh blade is always ready. Prices $5 to $50. Blades 50c. and $1 the packet. Dealers everywhere.

Merry Moments

Where Suggestion Failed. "Well, Jimmie," said a shopkeeper to his new boy, "you're back, I see, and you took your time. Did you give my letter to Mr. Smith?"

"Yes, sir," was the answer, "but I don't think Mr. Smith can read, sir."

"Why do you think that, Jimmy?"

"Because he's blind, sir."

"I didn't know that, Jimmy. What makes you think he's blind."

"Well, sir, when I went into his room, he asked me twice where my hat was, and it was on my head all the time."—Epworth Herald.

Facial Measurement. A teacher one day asked her class if they knew which was the longest word in the English language. A small hand waved frantically.

"Well, Johnny, what is the longest word?"

"Smiles," promptly answered Johnny.

"But that has only six letters!"

"Yes'm, I know it, but it's a mile between the first and last one."

Should Have Bitten Him. The schoolmaster possessed a very short temper and became extremely irritable when not obeyed at once. He was hearing the reading lesson, and Johnny was getting along famously until he came to the word "barque," when he halted.

"B—b—b— ba——" stuttered Johnny.

The master sharply said:

"Barque, boy; barque."

Johnny glared at the master with a look of perplexity on his face, and the master's temper rose.

"Barque, boy; barque," he roared.

Then Johnny, with a pitiful expression on his face, replied:

"Bow — wow — wow — wow!"—Christian Intelligencer.

The Choir Scored. Once in a while the choirs are enabled to score off the minister. The minister announced, just after the choir had sung its anthem, as his text, "Now when the uproar had ceased."

But the singers bided their time patiently, and when the sermon was over rose and rendered in most melodious fashion another anthem, beginning, "Now it is time to awake out of sleep."—Epworth Herald.

Kind to His Parents. "Has the scientific study made much difference in your boy, Josh?"

"Not as much as you might think. Out in the garden he calls everything by its botanical name. But when he's sittin' up to the table, passin' his plate, he's careful to use the kind of words we all understand."—Washington Star.

His Clutch Slipped. Harold, aged four, was trudging the distance of many blocks with his father to Sunday school, and the long tramp was almost too much for him. The father, glancing back, noticed the small boy's fatigue, and slackening his pace, asked:

"Am I walking too fast, son?"

"No," returned the small boy, puffing and panting breathlessly, "it's me, papa."

An Apt Pupil. A well-known lawyer tells this good story of his efforts to instruct his office boy. One morning in midsummer the young master-of-millions-to-be blew into the office, tossed his cap at a hook, and announced: "Say, Mr. Blank, they's a ball game down 't the park today, an' I'm goin' down."

The attorney was willing, but thought a lesson in good manners would not be amiss. "Jimmy," he said kindly, "that is not the way to ask a favor. Now, you come over here and sit down and I'll show you how to do it." The boy took the office chair and his employer picked up the cap and stepped outside. Then he opened the door softly, walked quietly to the opposite side of the room, hung the cap securely on the hook, and, turning, said to the small boy in the big chair, "Please, sir, there is a ball game at the park today. If you can spare me I would like to get away for the afternoon." In a flash the boy replied, "Why, certainly, Jimmie; and here is fifty cents to pay your way in."

This One Limps. Children often puzzle over a matter a long time without asking an explanation. Little Dora had a pet chicken, which was a cripple, having had its toes frozen off, and its name got to be "Lamey." For years Dora wondered what connection there was between this pet and her nightly prayer, "Now I lay me down to sleep."

The Centicorpus. Mrs. L— and Mrs. D— are adjoining neighbors in a suburb near New York. Each had just finished hanging out her week's wash.

"I declare!" remarked Mrs. L—, as she hung up the last sock, "to look at all those stockings one would think that I washed for a centipede."

"Me, too," returned Mrs. D—. "Just look at those shirts."

Young People's Topics for August 13

Growth: Body, Mind, Spirit

B. Y. P. U. Luke 2 : 4-52.

MANY people really never grow up; and of all the sad and terrible things that can happen this is just about the worst.

There are three chief and unfailing rules for growth, that apply equally well and surely to spirit, mind and body. They are purity, health, exercise. Cleanness of body, mind and spirit—and cleanness of spirit demands the personal blessing and companionship of God; health of body, mind and spirit; exercise of body, mind and spirit will make people really grow.

Emphasize exercise. Live the objective life. Work hard for others. Give the Holy Spirit right of way.

True Beauty and How to Get It

Christian Endeavor. Prov. 31 : 10-31.

HERE are some practical suggestions that will make any face beautiful.

Learn to think: develop your intelligence. An empty head can hardly produce or maintain real beauty of the face.

Keep smiling; keep cheerful. Compel the light of gladness on your face to make up for any lack on nature's part.

Be thoroughly, genuinely unselfish. Don't think about how you look but about what you can do to make other people happy.

Most necessary of all, get into close personal communion with Christ. "Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us" (Psalm 90 : 17). Keep looking to Jesus. Then "we all, with open face reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image" (II Cor. 3 : 18, R. V.). "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (II Cor. 4 : 6). "Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty" (Isa. 33 : 17). See how much even the Old Testament has to say about the "Beauty of Holiness."

Cultivate health. Do lots of work and take plenty of exercise. Live all you can in the open air. Use water generously inside and out.

Forget all about your desire to be beautiful. Get enthusiastic about trying to bring gladness to others. And then if you could hear what other people are saying about you when you are not near, you would find that they think you have found real beauty.

The Crippled Wrestler's Victory

Epworth League. Gen. 32 : 24-30.

ONE of the most beautiful sentences in the Bible is this brief sentence from the thirty-second chapter of Genesis: "He blessed him there." No life can be at its fullest, strongest and best until one can say, referring to some time and place: "He blessed me there." Turn just now to Psalm 67 : 7—"God shall bless us." Why not cash that splendid check signed with God's own hand at this very moment?

If the deepest truth could be known about this struggle of Jacob, it would be seen that his struggle was actually not with God but with himself. God had blessed Jacob before, at Bethel (Gen. 28 : 11-22) and at Mahanaim (Gen. 32 : 1-2). But there were still many evil things in Jacob's heart. Selfishness, greed and even craftiness remained there. And when he came face to face with God he was conscious of dreadful defilement just as Isaiah was when he saw the Lord in the temple (Isa. 6 : 5).

But Jacob determined to let God have his perfect way in his life. He surrendered to him, utterly, to be cleansed of all his defilements. He had sent all his family and all his possessions ahead across the brook, and remained alone with God. As the night passed he remained in prayer, conscious of the rebellion, the defilement remaining in his soul, but determined to be cleansed.

As the morning broke the blessing came. We often approach the peace of blessing and turn away because we are not willing to pay the price. Yet after all there is no price to pay. We have only to take away the hindering things that stand between us and the kind heart of God. "God shall bless us." That is the sure promise. He will bless us just as soon as we are ready; just as abundantly as we will allow.

The leader should read the two great Wesley sermons, "Sin in Believers" and "Repentance of Believers," in preparation for the meeting. Be sure during the meeting to read part of the fifty-fifth chapter of Isaiah, particularly verses 10 to 13.

Now go back to that verse in the Psalms, "God shall bless us." Then what? "All the ends of the earth shall fear him." If we will let him bless us as he wants to bless us, we shall be equipped for helping him in the gigantic business of saving and blessing the world.

Suffering in Jerusalem

THE privations arising from the war, which are causing distress in many lands, are being keenly felt in Jerusalem. Professor George L. Robinson, the distinguished archeologist and authority on Oriental lands, who has spent many years in Syria, writes to us from Chicago that the American Colony in Jerusalem, which has been doing an excellent industrial relief work among the poor of the city, is in sore straits for want of funds. Mrs. Bertha Vester, one of the founders and managers of the colony, writes appealing to the Christian Herald's readers for further help, and adds that there is much work to be done in relieving distress, and that the conditions are indescribable. Owing to the Mediterranean blockade and other causes, the colony is unable to market its product at the present time, and a large number of native workers who have been supported from this source are suffering much hardship, and will be compelled to endure even greater privations unless relief comes from some source. One of the contributing causes of the present distress is the failure of fruits and other crops this season, owing to the recent plague of locusts, which swept a large section of the country absolutely bare of all vegetation.

SOMEWHERE every day lucky youngsters are getting their very first taste of Kellogg's Toasted Corn Flakes—the tender crispy flakes with the fresh-from-the-oven taste. If there was any way in the world to make Kellogg's better don't you suppose it would be done?

Imitations come and go!
They change their name
They change their form
Some do both
Why?

Questions and Answers

A. P. Spruce, Mo. Do Christians see unobstructed, undimmed visions of the work they should do and the course to pursue in preparation? Should one expressly feel a call to the ministry before going into that work? For years I have had a strong desire to carry the message of salvation. The thought gives me constant worry, for above all things I want to do God's will.

Comparatively few Christians, we believe, see their own work far into the future. In the case of some of the great leaders described in Scripture, they seem not to have known what shape their work would take. Moses must have had many pangs of disappointment and uncertainty during his forty years in the wilderness before being allowed to begin the great work of delivering his people. Elijah and others of the prophets had times of great discouragement and misgiving. The lesson for every servant of Christ to learn is to follow "one step at a time." We do, however, believe most heartily in the "call to preach." Many ministers have experienced this call in a manner amazingly clear and definite. Many have felt just such troubled uncertainty as you describe before finally yielding to the suggestion to preach. If these leadings are followed, a clear vision and loud call will probably be experienced, and then your path will be made plain. As to circumstances and tasks which would hinder the new work, here, too, we must use our consecrated judgment, ready to wait till the present task is finished and the responsibilities met, or ready to venture out in the new work, trusting God to care for us and for those dependent upon us. We must always remember that we do not need to go into the ministry to be active workers for God. In fact, some of the most successful soul-winners and Bible teachers have been and are those who make their living at secular tasks while giving their deepest thought and all available time to spiritual service.

Friend, Rensselaer, N. Y. We have frequently explained in the Mail-Bag that the very fact of one being in deep anxiety about sin, and concerned about forgiveness, is of itself evidence that the Spirit is still striving to draw him back to repentance. Where the Spirit ceases to strive, there is no soul-panic, no apprehension, but an apathy and indifference that are fatal to spiritual restoration. Such a one is "twice dead" (Jude 12) and past hope, except by a miracle of God's grace. Remember, that the bar to repentance is in the apostate's own attitude toward God, not in God's attitude toward the sinner.

M. J. H., Burbank, Calif. The question is controversial and could not be decided by discussion in the Mail-Bag. Where the differences between Christians are not vital and do not affect the fundamentals, we should treat such differences with tolerance and respect.

F. A. H., Montgomery City, Mo. It is not an easy task to indicate the greatest of modern evangelists. From the time of C. G. Finney, whose work was most marvelously acknowledged in the conversion of souls, down to the present, we have a long roll of names of those who have been distinguished in the evangelistic field. These include D. L. Moody, George H. Stuart, Wilbur F. Chapman, Richard Weaver (the collier evangelist), Evan Roberts (the Welsh evangelist), Dr. R. A. Torrey, "Gipsy" Smith, Rev. Mr. Biederwolf, and W. A. Sunday. Each of these men has been the means, under God, of drawing multitudes to Christ.

M. A. C., Schenectady, N. Y. Does God ever allow Christians to be tempted beyond their strength and the strength of their faith in him in order that they may better realize the horror of sin and the joy of being restored through the power of Christ?

Never. "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it" (1 Cor. 10 : 13). It would be cruel and unjust if God allowed us to fall just so we might realize our weakness and sin's power, or that we might experience the joy of being brought back. God allows temptation because it is only by such tests that character can be developed. And with every temptation there is always that sure way of escape, if only we will insist upon finding it. In every case of our failure it is because we were doubting God instead of trusting him. We tried to find some other way of escape than the way he had provided—the way of faith in him.

S. T. J., Pioneer, La. Please reconcile Luke 2 . 13, 14, with Matt. 10 : 35, 36. Do the foes alluded to in verse 36 mean members of one's own family or the evil desires in one's own heart?

We have explained before that Christ's statement that he had come to bring strife and a sword on earth did not mean that he wished any such results to accompany his coming and his work, but that such results were inevitable. Christ sets up a standard that arouses the antagonism of evil-minded men. He tells people to be unselfish, helpful, self-sacrificing; and because people are naturally greedy and selfish and self-seeking they not only refuse to accept his standards but oppose and attack those who do. Every moral reform is opposed by those who do not wish to be just and right and whose self-interests will be injured by the triumph of righteousness. Christ has come to bring peace, but before peace can reign, wrong must be overthrown, and wrong cannot be overthrown without a struggle. The "foes" referred to doubtless mean literally the members of one's own family circle who oppose the cause of righteousness and love. There have been countless cases in which this sad prophecy of Christ has been literally fulfilled, and a man or woman, or perhaps a child, found that his opponents in his zeal for Christ's cause were those of his own household. The passage does not at all refer to any foes that may remain in one's own soul, though such foes do remain until they are purged away by the Holy Spirit's power.

A. M. H., Walum, N. D. 1. Is it wrong, according to the Scriptures, to add such words as "ma'am" or "sir" to yes or no in conversation? 2. Is it improper to use the expression "the" Christ?

1. You are probably thinking of the passage: "Neither be ye called masters; for one is your Master, even Christ" (Matt. 23 : 10). This is among the many passages of the Scriptures where one must seek the spirit of the words rather than the letter. In the verses immediately preceding the one quoted Jesus seems to forbid calling another "teacher" or "father." But we know he can have no real objection to a Christian's addressing his teacher as "teacher" or his father as "father," so long as he recognizes in his heart and will that his first allegiance is to Christ as Teacher and to God as Father. Just so, the terms "sir" and "madam" are merely polite forms of courtesy. They are unfortunate terms, perhaps, because they imply an unwholesome sort of servility; but so long as they are in universal use as merely indicating respect and civility there can be no real harm in their use so long as the speaker does not surrender his real feeling of independence and equality in the sight of God. Much, however, is to be said in favor of the beautiful custom of the "Friends" of addressing every one by that happy title. 2. There is no impropriety in inserting the word "the" before the name "Christ," because Christ means the Messiah, or the Anointed One.

The Thin Little Twins

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

THE thin little twins went out to play
In the pasture lot on a sunny day;
Their legs were stiff and their faces small
Were filled with fear of the world—and all
They did was run to their mother's side,
As if they would like to go and hide.

The thin little twins spoke soft and low
(In the horse's way, that we do not know);
"The world is big, is it kind?" they said,
With puzzled shakes of each little head.
"Will it smile at us as we grow up high?"
Said the little twins with a worried sigh.

The thin little twins stood waiting there,
In the crystal cool of the morning air;
And their mother said, "All the world is kind,
And faith and trust you will surely find,
If to evil deeds you will whisper, 'neigh!'"
And she smiled at them (in the horses' way).

Moral . . .

And do you know, though you're not a horse
(You only are with a cold, of course!),
It isn't bad if you keep this rule,
To help you out in life's rigid school.

E. M., Erie, Pa. 1. You are mistaken in imagining that the pulpit has been silent on the great moral questions involved in the European War, including that of Americans who ake death-dealing ammunition for gain. Many very able p ors have spoken out boldly on this subject, one of the leaders a ong them being Rev. Dr. C. E. Jefferson of the Broadway ber-nacle, New York. Another is Rev. Martin B. Har of the First Presbyterian Church of Chicago, and the are many more whom we could name. 2. Conditions in ble times were such that no questions could arise like thos hat now exist in connection with modern warfare. Gun nd explosives were unknown.

D. D. B., Johnstown, Pa. Was Babylon still in existe in the Christian era? Lumen, in his new book, "Far nce unto the Gentiles," says that Babylon did not e in the time of St. Peter. If not, what are we to unde nd from I Peter 5 : 13?

The Babylonian empire ended with the conquest of t ity by Cyrus, B. C. 538. The city itself was partially dest yed by Darius Hystaspis B. C. 500, the walls and gates ing thrown down. Later Xerxes plundered and demolishe the temples. Thereafter the city was neglected and unpopu ed and in time became a vast overgrown ruin. Jerome the year 4 A. D. writes of it as having been made a huntin ark for the Persian kings. The ruins of Babylon were sed as building material in the construction of at lea six other cities that have sprung up since its decay. So tho gh has been the destruction of the once great city tha not only are the traces of its principal buildings los out the very site itself is in dispute. The referen in I Peter 5 : 13 to Babylon is explained by the fact hat Babylonia was the center from which the Asiatic Disp ion (whom Peter addresses) was derived. Josephus, the ish historian, states in his "Antiquities" that Babylon con ned some 8,000 Jews in the apostolic age, the Parthians en being masters of that part of Mesopotamia.

Subscriber, Newark, Ill. The belief in a future life is ti-cally as old as the human race. Some of the passages q ted from the Bible against this belief are misapplied by thos ho quote them. As an illustration, Job 14 : 12 has been q ed; but it means that the patriarch had no hope of living ag in the present order of the world; not that he had no hope life in a new order of things. If you read on in the same ch er, you find that he passes, in verses 13 and 14, to the br ter hope of a world to come, and in Job 19 : 25, 26, 27 he c rly asserts his belief in the immortality of the righteous. I id, speaking of his child in another life, says (II Sam. 12 3), "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me." In sc of the Psalms there are passages dealing with the temp ry character of the present life, which are frequently mis er-stood, and one need only refer to Psalms 17 : 15, 49 : 1 16, 73 : 24, 26, and 28, to be convinced that the Psalmist, ile measuring the span of human life, did not lose sight the eternal life beyond. It is well to be warned of thos ho juggle with Scripture, and attempt to bolster up fals on-clusions, when a full understanding of text and context uld set the matter in its true light.

The Naked Truth About Mexico

By DR. J. W. SLAUGHTER

DISCARDING romance and conjecture, and writing in the simplest and most direct fashion, Dr. Slaught lifts the curtain and lets in the light on the actual s ation in Mexico, in what is doubtless the best-i ormed non-partisan presentation of the subject that h yet appeared. Delivered as an address before the C Club of Philadelphia, it is now printed in the C istian Herald by special permission of the author.

WHEN in October last it was announced that the United States government had decided to accord recognition t the Mexican revolutionists fighting uler Carranza, Mexico became an iiting field in which to study revolut n and reorganization. I decided wh others to go and see what was hpening. Mr. Carranza was coming t the border to meet the representat of the United States, and it was r nored that practically the whole of h government was on the train with h . There were, of course, delays; w waited nearly a week at San A onio and another at Eagle Pass b re the train arrived. The interval g e a good opportunity to study b der conditions, which were at that t e in a state of great agitation.

n a few days the real inwardness o the border trouble became clear: t permanent antagonism between A ericans and Tejanos, Mexicans r dent in Texas, the political cor- r tion of the Brownsville region, the n carriages of justice, all of these led t a racial feud with which Mexico h nothing to do except as a place of r ge for those who had committed a ocities.

As there was no news of Carranza's movements f several days, the dominant opinion in Eagle Pass, w ch concentrated into a rumor and crystallized into a port, was that Obregon had placed the First Chief uler arrest and had taken charge of revolutionary a irs. It was also reported that financial agents from t United States were on their way to provide Obreg , with funds to start a counter revolution. It was s wn by the event that t defection of this gene l was not a fact but o y a wish.

During all this time n own opinions were q te unformed. Resid ce in a small South A erican republic and fi t hand experience of t revolutions had prep ed me to look for n hing more than a f ional fight, a scramb for power and the u al Latin-American e oluments of power. I w well acquainted with t military mode of e tion to office. I was f her inclined to beli e that if patriotism e sted in Mexico, it w ld be found in Villa r her than in the other l ders. In other words, n prejudice was the u al one.

At last the Carranza p ty was reported to be a iving at Piedras Negr , having required two d s to cover the last few m es. After hours of w ting at the station the t in came in long after d k, preceded by a t op train. The latter i one of the most pic- t esque sights in Mexico. The tops of freight cars are covered with soldiers accompanied by their women folk, the soldaderas, who constitute the nursing and commissary department of the army. Blankets are stretched to make low tents and wind shelters on the tops of the cars, where also fires for cooking are kept burning. Only by having their families with them can the soldiers be kept on any extended campaign.

"The tops of freight cars are covered with soldiers . . . "

After Mr. Carranza's arrival, the government was established in the custom house, which was also the official residence of the First Chief for the time being. There was some speech-making to the inhabitants of the town who crowded the adjoining places. In the three or four succeeding days visits were received from the various foreigners who were waiting, the note of recognition was presented, there were conferences with Mr. Lind, Mr. Silliman and Mr. Arredondo, interviews were granted to newspaper men, and there was opportunity to see the ambulatory government at work.

Mr. Carranza is about sixty years of age, large of frame, with a great head, heavy features and the proverbial beard. He is very shy and reserved, slow and dignified in manner, talks very little but simply and directly, and makes no public speeches. He was accompanied by two or three governors of states, several generals as well as the general staff of the army, the minister of foreign relations and the interior, with aides, telegraphists and press men. Mr. Carranza kindly gave permission to accompany him on his train, so Mr. Lincoln Steffens and I went on board the night before departure. The favor was a great one, as the Pullman was crowded, and high officials had to be dislocated in order to make room for us.

THE First Chief has only the most frugal fare, and food for the rest of us was excessive in neither quantity nor quality. When a village was reached the train stopped for a few hours or perhaps over night, the inhabitants gathered, Mr. Carranza descended and walked about with them, discussed their local needs and set their municipal government going, withdrawing whenever possible his military administration. From village to village and town to town he went in his leisurely way, reconstructing the government of the country and solidifying it with amazing simplicity and certainty. It began to dawn on me that this man was really in the saddle and holding the reins, that he was on his job and was able to carry it through. I began to learn other things about him. He had no secret plans, no subterranean policy. When approached by interviewers as to his intentions, he referred them to the Plan of Guadalupe, a program of reforms which he drew up at the very beginning of his revolution, to which he has adhered with undeviating tenacity, and which he is putting into effect by military decree. Every one knows what he stands for, and what he is going to do. This simplicity and stubbornness make him the great cohesive factor in the revolution. His honesty is only brought in question by his more virulent enemies; it is met by the fact that no financial interest dares try to bribe him.

As the opportunity of studying the consequences of the revolution from the point of view of Mr. Carranza's train seemed to me limited, I decided to leave for Mexico City. It was there that I began to comprehend the far-reaching significance of the civil struggle. Only the enemies of a movement are competent to give one an estimate of its value, and I had already discovered that the enemies of the revolution were to be found in the metropolis. The limitations and weaknesses are certain to be indicated; for the rest

The Christian's Sevenfold Freedom

*A SERMON BY REV. R. A. TORREY, D.D.

TEXT—Romans 8 : 1-39.

THERE is no word more dear to the American heart than the word "freedom." Freedom is the one thing of which we make our boast. But the only real freedom is the freedom of a child of God, as our Lord Jesus Christ says in John 8 : 36, "If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." Every American boasts that he is free, but we are not all free, only those who are in Christ are free. As we study the 8th chapter of Romans, from which our text is taken, we shall find that the freedom of the child of God is sevenfold.

The first element of the Freedom of a Believer in Christ is found in the first verse, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." The one who is in Christ Jesus, i. e., who has accepted Christ Jesus as his atoning Saviour, who bore his sins in his own body on the cross, and as his risen Lord to whom he has surrendered the control of his life, is free from all condemnation. Every sin he ever committed is blotted out. God no longer reckons it against him. Every sin of the believer in Christ, past, present and future, was atoned for and put away by the death of Jesus Christ on the cross, and the moment any one accepts Christ, that moment his record before God is absolutely clean. If the wickedest man and woman should come in here this morning and should here and now accept Jesus Christ as their personal Saviour, and surrender to him as their Lord and Master, the moment they did that, every sin they had ever committed would be blotted out and God would regard them as if they never had sinned.

Some years ago, speaking in the Moody Church in Chicago, on this same chapter, I made the remark, "If the vilest woman in Chicago should come into Moody Church this morning and should here and now accept the Lord Jesus as her personal Saviour, every sin she ever committed would be instantly blotted out." Unknown to me, a member of my congregation had gone down that very morning to a den of infamy and found a woman who was an outcast and utterly vile, and had invited her to come to the Moody Church. The woman replied: "Church is not for the likes of me. I would not be welcome at church." To this the other said, "You would be welcome at our church." "No," the woman insisted, "it would not do for me to go to church." Then the Christian woman said, If you will go with me I will go with you." "No," the other replied again, "that would never do. If I were to go with you, they would think you were just such as I am." But the Christian woman had the spirit of the Master and replied, "It matters not to me what they may think of me; if you will go with me I will go." And up La Salle Avenue they came until they reached the church. The woman who was a saint ascended the stairs and entered the church. The woman who was a sinner followed her, timidly pushed the door open, saw a vacant seat in the very last row, under the gallery, and hesitatingly entered and dropped into that seat. Just a few moments after she had taken her seat I made the remark quoted above.

My words floated down over the audience, dropped into the heart of the woman who was a sinner in the last seat under the gallery. She believed the word spoken; she saw Jesus on the cross making atonement for her sins; she put her trust in him. God met her then and there and she found pardon and peace. When the service was over she came walking up the aisle, with the tears running down her cheeks, to tell me how God had blessed her.

THE second element in the Freedom of the Believer we find in the second verse, "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death." What the law of sin and death is we find in the preceding chapter, verses 9 to 24. Paul tells us there how, at a certain time in his life, he had been brought face to face with the law of God—the law given by Moses—and how he had consented to the law, that it was holy and just and good, and made up his mind to keep that law. But when he came to the actual keeping of it he made the discovery that there was another law within him which was altogether bad, and that law read this way: "The good I would do I cannot do, and the evil I would not do I must keep on doing."

Paul struggled to overcome this law of sin within himself. He determined he would keep the law of God, but the more he tried to keep the law of God, the more he failed. He found himself in utter captivity in the law of sin, until at last, in despair, he said: "O wretched man that I am: who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Then he made another discovery—that while there was the law of God outside of him which was holy and just and good, and the law of sin and death within him, that he must keep on doing the evil that he would not and leave undone the good he would, there was a third law which read this way: "What you cannot do in your own strength, the Spirit of God in Christ can do in you. He can set you free from this law of sin and death, can set you entirely free from the bondage of sin, so that the righteousness of the law will be fulfilled in you, if you walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit." In other words, the believer in Christ is free from the power of sin; he is enabled to quit sin and do righteousness.

There is many a drunkard who hates and despises the drink, and would gladly give it up. He knows drink is robbing him of his manhood, of his business capacity, of the love of his wife and respect of his children, of everything worth having, and he longs to quit and resolves to quit, but finds that he is in bondage to the appetite and cannot quit. But in Christ Jesus, the Holy Spirit snaps the fetters of the appetite and sets him free to lead a sober and true life. Just so many a man and many a woman is in bondage to an unconquerable temper, their temper turning their whole life into misery and their home into a hell on earth. They try to break away but cannot; they are in bondage to the law of sin and death in this form. But what they cannot do in their own strength, nor in any power of their own resolution, the Holy Spirit in Christ Jesus, when they accept him, can do for them, and set them free once and forever from the power of the temper which they themselves cannot control.

One of the greatest theologians that New England ever produced was the victim of an uncontrollable temper. He had a brother-in-law who was an infidel. There was some dispute about a matter of inheritance and the brother-in-law came over to the theologian's house early one morning for the purpose of annoying him and provoking him to anger. The theologian was at the breakfast table. The infidel brother-in-law did and said everything unreasonable just to get him angry and finally succeeded. The theologian flew into a towering passion. The infidel left, laughing to himself, went to his home and said to his wife: "Your brother is no more a Christian than I am. I have just been to his house and he lost his temper completely."

But no sooner had the infidel left the home than the Christian man became convicted of his sin and was overwhelmed with shame. He arose from the table and hurried to his brother-in-law's home, and without any attempt at self-defense, and without saying anything about how the infidel had sought to exasperate him, he made humble confession of his sin and asked his infidel brother-in-law's pardon. When he left, the infidel turned to his wife and said, "Your brother has something I have not. I could not do that." It is recorded that that great theologian never lost his temper again. The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus made him free from the law of sin and death in this form. It is the privilege of every believer in Christ to have constant victory over sin in any form.

THE third element in the Freedom of a Child of God we find in the eleventh verse, "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." In other words, the believer is set free from the power of death and, therefore, free from the fear of death. Death has no power over a true believer in Christ; he never dies. Jesus himself said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, if a man keep my saying, he shall never see death." The believer may fall asleep; his body may crumble into dust; but he does not die. He departs to be with Christ, which is far better (Phil. 1 : 23). His spirit is unclothed, laying aside its present body, "the earthly house of our tabernacle," and is "absent from the body," but is "at home with the Lord" (II Cor. 5 : 8, R.V.), in conscious blessedness.

But an even more wonderful freedom than this is ours. It is set forth in the fifteenth and sixteenth verses: "For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit himself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." The believer in Christ is not merely set free from the fear of death, he is set free from the fear of God. That, of course, oes not mean that he does not reverence God, that he oes not worship God with the deepest reverence and ve; but it does mean that he is not afraid of God, th he trusts God, that he is as free and fearless with G as a loving earthly child is with an earthly f er. Under no circumstances should he ever think of ere being a cloud between him and God. We hav not received the spirit of bondage again to fear— hat belongs to legalism, not to Christianity—bu he spirit which puts us in the place of sons, so th we may always look right up into God's face wi out hesitation, without reserve, and cry "Abba (p a), Father." Oh that Christians would only r ize their freedom, their complete deliverance fron the dread of God, and be as free and frank with hin s a loving and trustful child with a true and loving f er.

The fifth element in the Believer's Freedo we find in verse 28: "And we know that all things ork together for good to them that love God, to then hat are the called according to his purpose." Fre om from all fear of circumstances or calamity. A ild of God never needs to have one anxious mome no matter what his circumstances may be, no m ter what calamities may have overtaken or may thr en to overtake him. He may know that all things ork together for his good; and whatever his presen ircumstances, or whatever the calamity that has ertaken or threatens him, it is his privilege to ow that this is one of the "all things" which Go will make to work together with other things for od. The lives of many who profess to be Christian are spoiled by the dread of things which they fear ay overtake them. Many are dreading some sickn of which they think they see symptoms, or some c mity which they fear is impending. It is my pri ege and yours to live absolutely without fear, absol ely free from all anxiety.

The sixth element in the Believer's Freedo we find in the thirty-first verse: "If God be for us ho can be against us?" Freedom from all fear of an. The believer needs to fear no man if God be o his side. Men may be wise and cunning and mi ty, far too wise, and far too cunning, and far too m ty for me; but no man is any match for God. en though all the kings of earth were against us, t believer need have no fear, for if God is for us, wh an be against us? It is the believer's privilege t ive absolutely without fear of any man, or compa of men, no matter how great their hatred, how s led their determination to do him wrong, no matte ow cunning, how subtle, how wise, how mighty; f no man (and no company of men) is any match for od.

THE last element in the Believer's Freed is found in verses 35 to 39: "Who shall sep ate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, c anguish, or persecution, or famine, or nakedne or peril, or sword? Even as it is written, For hy sake we are killed all the day long; we were acco ed as sheep for the slaughter. Nay, in all these t gs we are more than conquerors through him that ved us. For I am persuaded, that neither death, no ife, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things presen nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor d th, nor any other creature, shall be able to separa us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesu our Lord." Freedom from the danger of ever being ost. The one who is in Christ can never be lost. Th gh all the powers of earth and hell, of men and d ils, conspire against us they cannot separate us fro the love of Christ. Christ says of his sheep, "I give nto them eternal life; and they shall never perish; n one shall snatch them out of my hand. My F er, which hath given them unto me, is greater tha all, and no one is able to snatch them out of the Fa r's hand." That is the believer's position: Go the Father Almighty's hand underneath him, Chris the almighty Saviour's hand over him, and he in bet een those two almighty hands—all the devils in hel annot get him. We are secure for all eternity. W are free from all danger of ever being lost. Our se ity does not depend upon ourselves, or on our stre th; it rests entirely upon the almighty strength of od the Father and God the Son.

Attention has often been called to the fact hat this wonderful chapter begins with no condem ion and closes with no separation. This, then, i the Sevenfold Freedom of a child of God, as set fo in this chapter: freedom from all condemnation, eedom from the power of sin, freedom from the ver of death, freedom from the fear of God, freedom om the fear of all circumstances or calamity, freedom om the fear of man, and freedom from all danger of ver being lost.

Strengthening the Hands

SUNDAY, August 13. Neh. 2 : 18. "And they strengthened their hands for this good work." What is the good of planning a work if we have no strength? What is the use of elaborate pgrams if we have no provisions? What is the good o building wind-mills if there is no wind? And yet t t is just what many of us are always doing. We ps resolutions, but nothing happens. We dream al talk about rebuilding the battered city, but the wls do not rise. And so often our visions become iolent reveries, and we just dream of doing all day lg. But these men of the olden time not only had tir great dreams, they strengthened their hands in Gl, and into them there came a glorious power of "t," and they laid hold of the ruined heaps of their er, and lo! the desired walls rose in their purposed pn and order.

n his essay on "Milton," Hazlitt has this glowing al suggestive word: "Milton seized the pen with a hd just warm from the touch of the ark." And so Mton's imagination was fired with religious zeal. Al so his genius was elevated and sanctified. It sne and burned with mystic flame. Milton's pen w; taken in hand in the very passion of consecration. Al this is surely the secret of triumphant work of ery kind in the kingdom of our Lord. Our work soften fails because we do not bring enough to it. V do not come to the pen from the ark. We take it u with a cold hand. We approach our tasks from bow and not from above. "Ye are from beneath: Im from above." No holy retinue accompanies us ipur enterprise. And therefore we are unarresting al unimpressive. There is no inevitable energy in uwherewith to shape disorderly circumstances into t order of the divine will. Circumstances laugh at u "Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are y" We issue our commands before we have had cmunion. We lay hold of our tools before we have sngthened our hands. We take the pen before we hre touched the ark.

n times like these, the manner in which we approach our problems will determine whether we shall sve them. There is no end of rebuilding to be done. Pcious things are lying in ruin on every side. Let ucome to our tasks from the very sanctities of the hy place. Let us strengthen our hands for the work, wh this as our prayer: "Establish thou the work of o hands upon us: yea, the work of our hands, eblish thou it." J. H. J.

Daniel's Messianic Vision Fulfilled

MONDAY, August 14. Dan. 9 : 1-27. "Unto Messiah the Prince"; "The Anointed One [or Mssiah] shall be cut off." The Anointed One is, of crse, our Lord. He presented himself as Prince when hentered Jerusalem, four days before his death, and t whole multitude broke into acclamations. But hv soon and how tragically he was cut off, and there w nothing left save the cross, and an empty grave.

But notice what that cutting-off had accomplished! Fst, it had finished transgression. When with his dng breath our Lord said, "It is finished," he did n simply refer to the conclusion of his earthly mistry, but to the ending of the Levitical sacrifices tt could never take away sin. In those dark hours tre had been a final dealing with sin on God's part. Bt that cutting-off also sealed up and made an end oins, so that through the cross we are enabled to be dd indeed unto sin. Sin has no more dominion over u because through participation in his death we have psed into union with the Prince himself. Iniquity is cered or purged away, so that it shall never be disinterred or discovered for our condemnation. Our res are washed white in the blood of the Lamb. A everlasting righteousness also has been brought in, n of the letter but of the spirit, not of outward cformity to law but of inward love to it. Everything tt vision or prophecy anticipated has been more tn realized in the sufferings of the Saviour and the gry of his kingdom; and we have entrance into the Mst Holy Place. F. B. M.

Mysteries of Nature that Stir the Soul

TUESDAY, August 15. Ps. 118 : 23. "This is Jehovah's doing; it is marvelous in our eyes." I the days of spring and early summer, as we walk in t country, watching the swelling buds and the fresh green of the opening leaf, we realize that Nature is about to enact again before our eyes the wonderful spectacle of her yearly miracle—and the sense of mystery is quite certain to pervade our thoughts. He who gets accustomed to commune with nature is constantly brought up against phenomena whose secret he alone knows, "whose dwelling is the light of setting suns."

There are some things that God has left for our faith and the understanding of our spirits—things too deep for words. "If you ask me," said St. Augustine, "what is time, I cannot tell you; but I know quite well if you do not ask me."

A man says to me: "I must reason everything out. I cannot know a thing is true unless it appeals to my reason."

But I tell him, "God has endowed you with powers higher even than your reason. There are the faculties of the soul; there are spiritual eyes, and it is through these alone that you can look out upon the mysteries of life, where reason stops and says, 'I do not know.'"

Keats has pictured a man "rich in the simple worship of a day." I have seen lines of Orientals bowing in reverence before the setting sun, and I have seen rough workmen pause on a hilltop to look back with a peculiar wondering light in their eyes at the golden streaks beginning to tinge the eastern sky. There may be no reason in it, but there is a kind of worship that is satisfied to stand with uncovered head before the vast mysterious beauty of God's universe.

Happy is the man whose soul is alive! To him mystery even speaks of God. C. S. C.

The Practice of Holiness

WEDNESDAY, August 16. Genesis 5 : 1-22. "Enoch walked with God." As we begin to study the great examples of prayer which accost us in Scripture, we naturally turn, first of all, to this inscription. Enoch has been described as the first mystic. But what is it to walk with God?

Does not this striking phrase denote a life of devotion, which is not confined to precise and definite acts, but is one unbroken and continuous fellowship with the Eternal God? We must always maintain these holy habits which our Lord referred to when he spoke of entering into the closet and shutting the door and praying to the Father who is in secret, and which are hinted at in that description of his attending service in the synagogue on that memorable Sabbath morning at Nazareth; but there comes a time in religious experience when the isolated dots become a firmly-drawn line, in which there is no break, but the soul lies open to the perpetual interchange of Jacob's ladder. There is no cessation in the long line of angels which come down and ascend on the heavenly escalator of communion.

One of our agnostic poets, some years back, speaking of God, said, "The Great Companion is gone!" But that hopeless affirmation is contradicted by the living experiences of thousands who are daily conscious of that fellowship and companionship which transforms the daily hum-drum of life into a foretaste of Paradise.

It is said of Solomon that in his earlier life he was a man of rest, and that surely describes those who know this walk with God, in which the soul is perpetually handing over to him its anxieties and worries, and receiving from him the right word to say, the power to cope with each emergency, the love which subdues all things to itself. The little child was right when she said that one day when God and Enoch were walking out together God said to him, "Come to my home and rest a while," and he was made so happy that he never came back. F. B. M.

Home Opportunities

THURSDAY, August 17. Mark 8 : 26. "And he sent him away to his home." There are some to whom the message of the far-off lands comes—"Behold, I will send thee far hence to the Gentiles"; there are still others, by far the greater number, doubtless, who, after they have received new life from God, are sent like the blind man with open eyes to his home.

It is the home with its commonplace surroundings often that tests the quality of our consecration to a great ideal. Solomon once said: "The eyes of a fool are in the ends of the earth." To be sure, there is no grander call than the foreign missionary call, unless it be the home missionary call, the call to show the fruits of love and unselfish devotion in the common things at your hand at home. Christ in sending out his disciples said, "Begin at Jerusalem." "Do the duty that lies nearest thee," said Carlyle. "When thou hast done that, the next will immediately appear."

Is it needful to remember that the Master served faithfully nearly thirty years at the carpenter's bench, that he might show us that the highest kind of heroism is not in the heart that is restless to serve a faraway ideal and forgetful that the doors of the kingdom of God swing wide before us in the place where we were born, our home.

Is it not possible that at times we are too eager for "social betterment," or for the fancied good of the heathen, when loving faces look up to us in vain in our own home, waiting, hungering for some of the interest we are displaying for outside and distant things? C. S. C.

The Night Watch with God

FRIDAY, August 18. Gen. 15 : 1-21. "And Abram said. . ." Our Lord pronounced a Beatitude on those who were not offended. It may be called the Blessedness of the Unoffended. All God's saints have come on passages in their lives when they were tempted to stumble at God's dealings. In this passage the father of those that believe was strongly tempted in that direction. God had already assured him that he would be preserved from Chedorlaomer's revenge for his defeat. Those gracious words, "Fear not, I am thy shield and thine exceeding great reward," must have been very reassuring and comforting; and yet, what were all these gifts to a man who longed more than words could express to press a son and heir to his breast? "O Lord God, what wilt thou give me, seeing that I go childless?" As a night wind in a desert land, there swept over him a feeling of lonely desolation, of disappointment, of hope deferred. More than ten years had passed since he had entered Canaan. Three successive promises had kindled his hopes, but they seemed as far from realization as ever. Not one inch of territory! Not a sign of a child! Nothing of all that God had foretold!

Underlying this complaint, there was the earnest prayer of a sorely-beset soul for help and deliverance; and this attitude continued through the subsequent day. Higher and higher the sun drove his chariot up the sky, and shone with scorching heat on those pieces of flesh lying exposed on the altar, and it was only when finally the night fell on the scene that the assurance came of the seed which should inherit all that land. It is thus that the heart pours out its complaint in the ear of One that never forgets. It is thus we watch and wait for God. It is thus that he abundantly answers. F. B. M.

Having Nothing Yet Possessing all Things

SATURDAY, August 19. Luke 18 : 30. "In the world to come, life everlasting." He who surrenders self to God secures both worlds. If we should hear the testimonies of those in the upper galleries, how much less we would prize the little, passing trivialities of the present. Moses would say, "I esteemed the reproaches of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt. I am not disappointed. The recompense of the reward is of priceless value." Paul might exclaim, "I suffered the loss of all things that I might win Christ. The weight of glory is unspeakably greater than the light afflictions." John Wesley might testify, "What I gave, I saved; what I kept, I lost. I surrendered my little treasure in that moment life and now it comes back to me on these eternal shores, ships laden with immortals. The church I founded is sending representatives here from all lands, while my soul is surfeited with glory."

What did these noblest heroes leave when they departed this life? Moses left a heroic example of patience and devotion—a great legacy to mankind. Paul left the immortal Epistles, a life of purity and power that has thrilled the hearts of men. Elijah left an old, wornout mantle for Elisha, as the chariot rolled him up to his mansion. Jesus left a seamless coat, but even that treasure was not allowed his mother. The apostles and martyrs left bleeding bodies for glorified spirits. Having nothing, they possessed all things in the life everlasting. E. W. C.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

The Prohibition Candidates. The National Prohibition Party in convention in St. Paul, Minn., on July 21 nominated J. Frank Hanly of Indiana for President. Dr. Ira D. Landrith of Nashville, Tenn., is the nominee for Vice-President. The platform opposes the "wasteful military programs of the Democratic and Republican parties;" favors "preparedness for peace" but pledges the party to maintain an adequate army and navy until such time as the nations can be led to agree to "dismantle navies and disband armies"; opposes war with Mexico; favors legal encouragement of the merchant marine, woman suffrage and the initiative and referendum. The keynote of the convention was sounded by Daniel A. Poling, temporary chairman, in this opening paragraph: "The call of the hour is the challenge of a supreme opportunity to an unparalleled sacrifice. Theso are the words of triumph: Peace, Prosperity, and Prohibition. Elect Prohibition. Write woman into the constitution. Turn out the exploiters of the people. Take private profit from war. Stop the slaughter of peace. Save America and serve tho world."

Millions for the Navy. The Senate passed the Naval Appropriation Bill on July 21 by a vote of 71 to 8. The total appropriation is $315,000,000, of which $110,726,160 is for the first year's construction on a building program to be completed in three years at a total estimated expense for construction of $588,180,576; 157 vessels are authorized. The bill as it passed the House authorized only seventy-two ships and made no provision for further construction. The Senate retained the provision for a government armor plant. The bill now goes to conference.

To Rescue Shackleton's Men. The Hudson Bay Company has gratuitously placed their vessel, the Discovery, especially built for arctic exploration, at the disposal of the British government to be used in rescuing the members of Shackleton's antarctic expedition marooned on Elephant Island. The vessel was reported July 23 as outfitting for the rescue trip.

Unsatisfactory Reply to Mail Protest. In rather tardy response to a request for a reply to the American protest regarding the seizure of neutral first-class mail, Great Britain forwarded the State Department at Washington a note, made public July 24, which is intended to explain four of the items in the specific complaint. The note disclaims any attempt to benefit British commerce through the censorship at the expense of neutrals, and states that "His Majesty's government will be ready to explain in detail the working of tho censorship, as there is nothing in regard to it that they desire to conceal." Immediately upon receipt of this partial reply, the State Department instructed the American ambassador in London to again request of the British government a formal response to the American communication. The law of nations expressly provides that first-class mail proceeding under the official seal of a government whether neutral or belligerent shall bo held inviolable and shall be forwarded with the utmost possible dispatch. This law of nations, expressly stated in the Hague Agreement, to which Great Britain is a signatory, is being violated daily by the British censorship.

Home Rule for the Church. The committee appointed three years ago by the Archbishops of Canterbury and New York, to consider problems of church reform within the church of England, reported on July 5 admitting that the criticism that the Church of England does not represent the mind of tho English peoplo has a basis of fact. The committee proposes the organization of a church council to consist of three houses, Bishops, Clergy and Laity. The house of Laity is to be representative, and special measures are suggested for insuring that not less than five per cent. of its members shall represent the working classes. It is proposed that measures passed by the church council should bo reviewed by a special committee of the Privy Council. In certain special cases, measures are to require Parliamentary sanction. A supplementary report by one member of the committee explains the aloofness of the working class from the church by the conviction that the church "is a moral policeman used in tho temporal interests of the property classes," and that "the moral teaching of the church is against progress."

Postal Savings Grow. The month of June, 1916, surpassed the best Juno record with a net gain of postal savings deposits of more than $3,800,000. On June 30 there were 7,701 post offices accepting deposits in the United States and territories, and over 603,000 depositors, who had standing to their credit more than $86,000,000. The increase was credited to tho increasing of the limit on deposits from $100 to $1,000.

All Wrapped Up. Japanese and Russian soldiers are said to be wearing clothes made of paper manufactured from mulberry bark. A thin layer of silk wadding is quilted between two sheets of paper. The fabric is said to be tough, yet soft, and strong enough to hold buttons sewed on in the ordinary way. Germany is said to be using paper with good success in mail-bags and in soldiers' knapsacks. It is probable that many new uses of paper will develop as a result of the exigencies of war. We do not expect, however, that any way will bo found to make really edible the papier-mâché sandwiches of the Raines Law hotels in New York.

A Hazard of Labor. An explosion of gas in a tunnel being driven under Lako Erie for the Cleveland water works caused the death on July 25 of twenty-two men. Of the dead, eloven were trapped in the tunnel by the explosion; the rest lost their lives in vain attempts to rescue the first victims. It was eleven hours after tho explosion before a party could be equipped with oxygen helmets, which enabled them to begin the real work of rescue. Eight men were also injured in the various attempts at rescue. Tho explosion occurred about one hundred feet from the crib and five miles from shore, and it is not explained how the gas in such quantities came to be in the tunnel.

Would Defer Clayton Act. A committee representing fifty-eight railroads made a personal appeal to the President on July 19 for an extension of the time provided in the Clayton Law, passed September 24, 1914, for the adjustment of the affairs of the carriers to comply with the provisions of the act. The law granted two years for the untangling of directorates and the unlocking of interlocking systems of control between railways and subsidiary and supply companies. Practically no progress has been made toward compliance with the law. The railways now ask further time because of the intricacies of the problem and because of the threatened strike of the railway brotherhoods.

The Trials of An Oriental Potentate. According to correspondents of the Associated Press, President Li Yuan Hung is finding his path beset with difficulties. Leaders of the southern revolution have developed personal ambitions and at least two members of the government, held over from the régime of Yuan Shi Kai, are under suspicion by the republican element, and both have resigned under fire: Liang Shi Yi, head of the Financial Council, and Chow Tzu Chi, formerly minister of commerce and a close adviser of Yuan. The premier, Tuan Chi Jui, is being attacked by the republican press because he has been unwilling to have President Li Yuan Hung issue a mandate restoring the Nanking provisional constitution, the first constitution of the republic, and reconvene the national assembly. It is said that three factions, Manchus in north China, military leaders of the Yangtse and the southern leaders, are all pulling at cross purposes. President Li's immediate concern, however, is the restoration of some degree of financial stability.

A New Danger Signal. Committees representing the Public Service Commissions, the railroads, and safety-first societies have been investigating various forms of danger signals to discover which shall be the standard for all crossings. It is planned to abandon the former red flag and to uso black and white. The committee recommends the placing of precautionary signs in tho highways at least three hundred feet from the railroad tracks, the signs to be twenty-four inches in diameter with a large black cross painted upon them, and the letters "R. R." These signals may be lighted at night. Red is be retained in the lighted signals a he crossings themselves, since it is f nd that the universal use of red mal it the only color which would be r og- nized as a danger signal in the rk. Flagmen in the daytime, instea of a red flag are to hold aloft a white isk sixteen inches in diameter, with a ick border and the ord "stop" in black l ers across the center. It has been found tha his signal can be recog zed farther than any (er.

To Pass Child La- bor Bill. As a ult of the urgent requ of the President, cho- cratic senators h a caucus on July 2 nd placed the Child l bor Bill on the cal dar ahead of the Shi ing Bill. This will ins a vote being taken l ore the adjournment of on- gress, and there is ery reason to believe hat the bill will be p ed.

May Die Augu 3. The execution of Sir Roger Case ent for high treason was set for Aug t 3 at Pentonville Prison. Much infl nce was being brought to bear to s ure a reprieve, and it was possible th the execution might bo deferred.

Uncle Sam Seeks Danish est Indies. It was announced in W shington on July 25 that negotiation had virtually been completed and that vas expected the treaty would be s hed within a few days, assuring the pur ase of the Danish West Indies by the U ted States. The proposed treaty pr des for the paymont by the United S tes to Denmark of $25,000,000, whi is regarded as excessive in some qua rs. Denmark having been ready to se the islands in 1902 for $5,000,000. The signing of the treaty will not, how er, consummate the purchase, for it ust be ratified by the American S ate and by the Danish parliament. The previous treaty failed of ratifi ion by one vote in tho Danish upper l se. The value of the islands to the U ted States was fully treated in tho Chr ian Herald of May 24.

Attacking a Gibraltar. A ike of the agents of the Prudentia In- suranco Company was called a recently organized union of agen on July 24. The strike is called in p est against the discharge of about rty agents who had been promine in organizing the union; but the a nts claim they havo other griev es. Strike leaders claim that 6,000 (the company's 13,000 agents are memb s of the union, and they expected at ast 10,000 to participate in the strike. The company declared that the claim the union as to the numbers of age in different cities as well as those on ike had been greatly exaggerated, and p cy- holders were assured that their p ies will be in no way affected by the s ke.

Strike Settlement Fails. C ing that their leaders had sold them ut. the striking cloakmakers of New ork City on July 27 refused to ratif the agreement which had been entere nto by the leaders with tho represent ves of the employers, and the strike on- tinued. Earlier in the day the ge ral committee which had had charge the strike had voted 43 to 40 to acce the terms. The workers felt that t in- crease in wages gained was not suff ent recompense for the sacrifices of the strike. The feeling of the st ers might perhaps have been intensifie y a

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

HE really important event of the past week was the capture by the Russians of the fortress of Erzgan in southern Armenia. Erzingan s not only a fortress but it was also ery important military base, the imtant base in fact of the Turkish ter.

n a strategic sense this capture is more important and significant n that of Erzerum, and should, if Russians are able to push home advantage thus gained, have most ious consequences to the entire rkish campaign in Asia Minor. In near future it seems inevitable that Turks will be obliged to draw back ir center to the Sivas position, 150 es to the southwest, which will omatically compel a proportionate reat of both their right and left wings. course, it is still a very long way for Russians, 500 miles. to Constantople.

East of Kut-el-Amara, along the ris River, the positions of the British l Turks remain unchanged. There e been some skirmishes at El Arish, out thirty miles from the Suez nal, during the past week, and it ears probable that the Turks are sent in this region in larger force n has hitherto been believed.

he British continue to gain ground German East Africa, and in the ting there in the past week the rman vice-governor of that colony s killed. Of course, it is only a estion of time before this colony benes British territory.

he Marquis of Crewe made the ouncement in Parliament during week that the northwest frontier India has been the scene of some ere fighting in the past year and half of a formidable character. cording to an announcement from ndon, the British government has apnted two commissions, one to instigate the campaign in Gallipoli and other that in Mesopotamia.

here has been some quite heavy ting on the Austro-Italian front, t except in the Dolomite region there not seem to have been any changes position of moment. In the Dolote district, so dear to the heart of the ropean tourist on account of its gnificent mountain scenery, the Itals made marked progress, and drove Austrians back a dozen or so miles, ides taking a number of prisoners.

t will be remembered that a few eks ago there was chronicled in this umn the capture of the British passger steamer Brussels, which ran ween Harwich and the Hook of lland, by a German torpedo boat, l her taking into the port of Zeegge on the Belgian coast by her tors. Her captain, Charles Fryatt, l, previously to this time, on March 1915, according to the Germans, empted to ram a German submarine, U-23, near the Maas lightship. and l, according to the story, received old watch from the British Admiralty his "brave conduct" on this occasion. ter his capture, Captain Fryatt was ced on trial before a German courtrtial for this exploit, the charge being t of "having committed an act of r though not belonging at the time the commission of such act of war the armed forces of the enemy"; demned to death, and was executed Thursday, July 27

THE fighting in Picardy on the western front, where the British and French are delivering their offensive against the German positions on a thirty mile front north and south of the River Somme, has been very severe all the week, at times becoming as desperate as any fighting we have so far seen.

The severest fighting took place on the seven miles running from Thiepval through the villages of Pozières aud Longueval to Guillemont, on the northern edge of the salient which the British have driven into the German lines. On Sunday, July 23, this line was the scene of a general assault by the British, which lasted all day and was particularly desperate in its nature, the combatants frequently coming to hand grips.

The British succeeded in capturing the outskirts of Pozières and holding them. They also captured Longueval, but lost it in a heavy counter-attack which the Germans delivered against them late in the day.

The Fourneau wood, which juts to the eastward at this point from the main British line, was also the scene of desperate hand-to-hand combats. The hardest fighting of the day, however, centered around Guillemont, which was taken and retaken not less than three times. All along the seven-mile front the fighting was incessant and the resultant casualties enormous.

On Thursday, the main portion of this front was quieter, but around the village of Pozières the fighting was even more desperate than the day before. The Australians, who had been ordered to take this village, fought furiously for its possession, while its German defenders made every effort to hold it. Night, however, found the Australians in possession of the major portion of the ruins which once constituted the village, as well as at the head of the road leading thence to Bapaume.

During Tuesday the Germans in a counter-attack in force made only insignificant gains. On Wednesday a series of scattered but violent engagements, which in any ordinary war would have been entitled pitched battles, took place. These were mostly along the curving line between Pozières and Maurepas, and resulted in further gains for the Australians in the village of Pozières itself, and to the north thereof along the Bapaume highway.

Thursday the Australians succeeded, after very desperate attacks lasting all day, in rendering their possession of Pozières complete, and in driving out of the village the last German defenders; and they were also successful in extending their lines along the Bapaume road, the real stake in this furious combat.

On the same day the British farther east made a desperate effort and succeeded for the second time in possessing themselves of the northern part of the village of Longueval, as well as a portion of the Delville woods to the east. Friday the fighting considerably abated and a comparative lull took place, though north of Pozières and in Longueval the British slightly improved and consolidated their positions.

The French holding the southern portion of the line were less active during the week than the British. On Saturday, July 22, they succeeded in capturing a few hundred yards of German trenches near Hardecourt. This whole front was quiet on Sunday, but on Monday they captured a German battery south of Estrées, south of the river, and gained a local advantage north of Vermandovillers. Wednesday another small advance was made by the French southeast of Estrées, which netted them a few prisoners, while Thursday and Friday their portion of the front was quiet.

The British issued on Thursday a sort of summary of the Picardy offensive to that date. The claim is made that the Allies had taken about 27,000 prisoners from July 1 to July 26, taken 38 villages and hamlets and captured several hundred pieces of artillery, 140 cannon and some 400 machine guns, besides large quantities of stores. The losses in men the British compute at about 400,000, of which experts figure that about half are British, leaving 200,000 for the French and Germans together. The exact British losses in officers were officially announced as 4,333, of which 1,108 were killed, 2,834 wounded, and 491 missing.

Around Verdun the week was dull. The French made some slight advances west and southwest of Thiaumont fort and took several hundred prisoners, while the Germans delivered no infantry attacks at all, but kept up a continuous bombardment of the positions of their enemy south of their own lines on the north front.

The situation on the Russian front in Europe has cleared a little during the week. In the north, on that portion of the line extending from Riga to Dunaburg, there has been some serioug fighting, in which both sides have been successful momentarily to the extent of penetrating the first line trenches of the opponent, but always being ultimately driven back to the original line.

From Dunaburg to the Pripet marshes the only hard and continuous fighting has been in the immediate vicinity, but to the east of the important railroad junction town of Boranovitchi, around which combats of more or less severity have raged from time to time for months. The possession of this town is an absolute necessity to the Germans in order to hold their battle line and to the Russians to compel a general retreat of the Germans.

Farther south on the line of the Stochod River, to Kiselin at the termination of the left fork of that stream, from whence the line runs southward across country until it reaches Gorochow on the Lupa in southern Volhynia, and then almost due southeast until Radzivilow is reached, heavy fighting has taken place, the objective being Brody, a railroad center in Galicia, only fifty-eight miles northeast of Lemberg. Battles took place at Berestschko and at Lobatschewka, north of Brody, which resulted favorably to Russian arms; and on July 28 the Russians reported the capture of the town, a report, which, at this writing, is still to be confirmed and doubtless will be.

President Protests Blacklist

The Acting Secretary of State to Ambassador W. H. Page.
(Telegram.)
Department of State.
Washington, July 26, 1916.

You are instructed to deliver to Sir Edward Grey a formal note on the subject of the Enemy Trading act, textually as follows:

"The announcement that his Britannic Majesty's Government has placed the names of certain persons, firms, and corporations in the United States upon a proscriptive :'blacklist' and has forbidden all financial or commercial dealings between them and citizens of Great Britain has been received with the most painful surprise by the people and Government of the United States, and seems to the Government of the United States to embody a policy of arbitrary interference with neutral trade against which it is its duty to protest in the most decided terms.

"The scope and effect of the policy are extraordinary. British steamship companies will not accept cargoes from the proscribed firms or persons or transport their goods to any port, and steamship lines under neutral ownership understand that if they accept freight from them they are likely to be denied coal at British ports and excluded from other privileges which they have usually enjoyed, and may themselves be put upon the blacklist. Neutral bankers refuse loans to those on the list and neutral merchants decline to contract for their goods, fearing a like proscription. It appears that British officials regard the prohibitions of the blacklist as applicable to domestic commercial transactions in foreign countries as well as in Great Britain and her dependencies, for Americans doing business in foreign countries have been put on notice that their dealings with blacklisted firms are to be regarded as subject to veto by the British Government. By the same principle Americans in the United States might be made subject to similar punitive action if they were found dealing with any of their own countrymen whose names had thus been listed.

"The harsh and even disastrous effects of this policy upon the trade of the United States and upon the neutral rights upon which it will not fail to insist are obvious. Upon the list of those proscribed and in effect shut out from the general commerce of the world may be found American concerns which are engaged in large commercial operations as importers of foreign products and materials and as distributors of American products and manufactures to foreign countries and which constitute important channels through which American trade reaches the outside world. Their foreign affiliations may have been fostered for many years, and when once broken cannot easily or promptly be reestablished.

"Other concerns may be put upon the list at any time and without notice. It is understood that additions to the proscription may be made 'whenever on account of enemy nationality or enemy association of such persons or bodies of persons it appears to his Majesty expedient to do so.' The possibilities of undeserved injury to American citizens from such measures, arbitrarily taken, and of serious and incalculable interruptions of American trade are without limit.

"It has been stated on behalf of his Majesty's Government that these measures were aimed only at the enemies of Great Britain and would be adopted and enforced with strict regard to the rights of neutrals and witb the least possible detriment to neutral trade, but it is evident that they are inevitably and essentially inconsistent with the rights of the citizens of all the nations not involved in war. The Government of the United States begs to remind the Government of his Britannic Majesty that citizens of the United States are entirely within their rights in attempting to trade with the people or the Governments of any of the nations now at war, subject only to well-defined international practices and understandings which the Government of the United States deems the Government of Great Britain to have too lightly and too frequently disregarded.

"There are well-known remedies and penalties for breaches of blockade, where the blockade is real and in fact effective, for trade in contraband, for every unneutral act by whomsoever attempted. The Government of the United States cannot consent to see those remedies and penalties altered or extended at the will of a single power or group of powers to the injury of its own citizens or in derogation of its own rights. Conspicuous among the principles which the civilized nations of the world have accepted for the safeguarding of the rights of neutrals is the just and honorable principle that neutrals may not be condemned nor their goods confiscated except upon fair adjudication and after an opportunity to be heard in prize courts or elsewhere. Such safeguards the blacklist brushes aside. It condemns without hearing, without notice, and in advance. It is manifestly out of the question that the Government of the United States should acquiesce in such methods or applications of punishment to its citizens.

"Whatever may be said with regard to the legality, in the view of international obligation, of the act of Parliament upon which the practice of the blacklist as now employed by his Majesty's Government is understood to be based, the Government of the United States is constrained to regard that practice as inconsistent with that true justice, sincere amity, and impartial fairness which should characterize the dealings of friendly Governments with one another. The spirit of reciprocal trade between the United States and Great Britain, the privilege long accorded to the nationals of each to come and go with their ships and cargoes, to use each the other's shipping, and be served each by the other's merchants is very seriously impaired by arbitrary and sweeping practices such as this.

"There is no purpose or inclination on the part of the Government of the United States to shield American citizens or business houses in any way from the legitimate consequences of unneutral acts or practices; it is quite willing that they should suffer the appropriate penalties which international law and the usage of nations have sanctioned: but his Britannic Majesty's Government cannot expect the Government of the United States to consent to see its citizens put upon an ex parte blacklist without calling the attention of his Majesty's Government, in the gravest terms, to the many serious consequences to neutral right and neutral relations which such an act must necessarily involve. It hopes and believes that his Majesty's Government, in its natural absorption in a single pressing object of policy, has acted without a full realization of the many undesired and undesirable results that might ensue.

POLK, Acting."

Can We Save Poland?

POLAND is dying of starvation—dying, while food in abundance is ready to supply all her needs. Her people are perishing by the thousands, while the warring powers of Europe, jealous and distrustful of each other, wrangle and dispute over the methods to be adopted in relieving her famine-stricken population, even while they profess sympathy for her fate.

Poor Poland! Since the war began she has been crossed and recrossed many times by the struggling armies, and hundreds of her cities, towns and villages are little more than shapeless ruins. One army after another in rapid succession has plundered her people; yet the stricken Poles have clung to their land when the war waves passed, and have struggled to live. But it has been a hopeless struggle; for under such frightful conditions the battle against hunger must always end in defeat—unless help comes.

Early this year our government in Washington communicated with the five leading European powers, proposing relief for Poland, offering to undertake the humane task and inviting cooperation. It wanted a clear road for the relief work—nothing more. The American Commission, with its unlimited resources, was confident of its ability to cope successfully with the great problem of Polish relief. These representations were renewed in the first week of July, and supplemented afterward by personal messages from President Wilson to the European rulers, pleading in Poland's behalf.

The outcome of this effort on our part has been more than disappointing; it has been amazing and well-nigh incredible. One government after another, like the man in the parable, "made excuses," or raised obstacles which made practical relief work an impossibility. Germany accepted the proposition in principle, and offered to extend full facilities to the American relief workers in Poland, as it did in Belgium, and to guarantee that every pound of flour and loaf of bread would reach its proper destination. Great Britain demanded an assurance that none of the food intended for Poland should go to feed the German or Austrian troops, and wanted a definite undertaking by both Germany and Austria that there should be no export from any section of the afflicted territory of any foodstuffs, native grown or imported, but that everything should be utilized for relief purposes in Northern Poland and exclusively for the civil population. Further, the British reply made it provisional that, as a part of the proposed arrangement, Germany and Austria should undertake in addition to feed the starving populations of Servia, Albania and Montenegro. This supplementary proposition proved unacceptable to Germany on the ground that it was "not in control of those countries."

Later exchanges between the governments still further complicated the situation. New stipulations and demands were presented and rejected. Not one step of progress was made toward the desired goal—the relief of Poland, whose fifteen million men, women and children were being decimated by actual starvation. The whole discussion has arrived at a point where agreement seems impossible, unless some strong argument is presented that will stir the negligent European powers to action.

Poland must be saved! Our government owes it to itself and to humanity to demand that all objections should be waived by the foreign powers, in order that the lives of these millions of helpless noncombatants should not be sacrificed because of official wranglings and differences, which are wholly prompted by international jealousies. If we fail to make a heroic effort to save Poland now, the responsibility for her fate will lie as much at our door as at that of Europe. Official dignity, the "sacredness" of blockades, and the absurd system of red tape which has been so disagreeably in evidence in the present negotiations, should all be disregarded. We must appeal to the governments on the broad basis of humanity to grant us permission to take the life-giving food into Poland which we stand ready to send there.

Let the readers of the Christian Herald, who have been in active sympathy and practical cooperation in many good works, urge this upon the President. Poland must be saved.

"Except a Corn of Wheat—"

IN the face of the many and frequent assertions that organic church union is impossible comes the steady stream of information from Canada that up there an actual organic denominational union is being effected. Three great churches of Canada, the Methodist, the Congregational, and the Presbyterian, have taken positive steps to bring this union to pass. The most recent action was that of the Presbyterian General Assembly of Canada, which voted 406 to 88 in favor of the union.

The three denominations thus merging their identity have seven hundred and fifty thousand members, more than six thousand churches, ten thousand preaching stations, and five thousand ministers. They claim a constituency of more than two million adherents; and disburse yearly, in addition to the funds applied to the upkeep of the individual churches, more than two million dollars for missions, education and other benevolences.

The Montreal Witness gives an interesting summary of the bases of union in the matter of doctrine, polity, and property. Divisive credal points are either omitted or are so worded that both parties can accept the statements. "Moreover," says the Witness, "the creed is not intended to be applied mechanically. The ministers on their ordination are not required to give formal consent to the mere wording of it, but to satisfy the ordaining committee of their 'essential agreement therewith.'" Matters of property and polity are adjusted with equal skill.

The new church is to be known as the United Church of Canada. This means, of course, that each of the three denominations will, upon the consummation of the union, actually lose its identity, its very existence. In the midst of the horrible spectacle of world-wide selfishness and strife it is a blissful thing to behold these great Christian denominations demonstrating that they are willing to die in order that a greater church may be born.

In these United States we have not traveled so far along the road toward church union as our Canadian brethren have done, and the obstacles in the way are far more numerous. It is only proper to recognize the fact that union among our leading denominations, to the extent of dropping all denominational lines, may still be very far off. The ultimate of the Christian Church is "one flock, one Shepherd," and it will yet doubtless be realized when all things are right in God's own good time.

A Panic that Hurts the Little Folks

THERE are few things more easily started and more difficult to allay than a groundless panic. For weeks past, indeed, almost since the beginning of the outbreak of infantile paralysis, many of the little towns and villages in the Middle States have been fed with rumors that have sown the seeds of disquietude. Every fact concerning the disease was printed, with the usual exaggerations intensified. Suburban townships became a law unto themselves and put up the bars tightly against child travelers. The fact that the children might be in perfect health, and provided with certificates from Federal, state or municipal health officials showing them to be free from infection, made no difference. Trains, boats, trolleys and every kind of public and private vehicle were boarded by local health vigilantes, and the rigors of the rural law were invoked against all who ventured to invade the quarantined territory. Suburban resorts and boarding-houses are deprived of thousands of patrons by this senseless panic. But a far greater injustice is done to the tens of thousands of children who are robbed of their annual summer outing through the course adopted by rural officials, who are liable to cause more real suffering and sickness than could possibly result from the trouble they seek to avert.

The Church in Politics Again

POLITICS would seem to possess an irresistible fascination for many ministers. Instead of preaching the Gospel and giving its modern application, they pull up the spiritual anchor and go drifting about on a dangerous tide, to anything but the edification of their congregations. It is little wonder that people lose the feeling of reverence for a church which mixes partisanship and salvation indiscriminately. The truth is that a political sermon comes perilously close to impertinence, and is wholly out of order, unless there be some supreme moral issue at stake—some great wrong calling aloud for redress. An illustration of this sort comes from Iowa, where a ministerial association in a leading city, representing nearly sixty preachers of various denominations, comes out in energetic support of one of the gubernatorial candidates, and has set apart a certain Sunday for its members individually to discuss the subject in their pulpits. This may be very satisfactory to the political bosses, but to the earnest worshipers it must seem an innovation that carries with it a sense of spiritual degradation. Their faith must be sadly shaken in the efficacy of a service which takes the form of a political tirade.

We hear of other churches whose ministers, is year, have undertaken to play the part of preside al boomers. There is not a trace of excuse for raising e religious issue in the present election. Both the l - ing candidates are sons of Protestant preachers. o appeal to denominational prejudice, as some minis s are now doing, is to set Christian congregations at v i- ance among themselves, and to drag the whole fa ic of Protestantism in the mire. To claim that, bec se a candidate belongs to a certain denomination, he is therefore a prescriptive right to the votes of his o- denominationalists, is to stir up the clannish s it which has at times been so marked in Cath ic churches when ecclesiastics undertook to turn t n into political machines.

Our advice to Protestant ministers everywhere s: leave politics severely alone. Any pastor who t- tempts to raise the denominational issue may find it later that he has lost the respect of his own congr a- tion, and of every fair-minded American besides.

What Mr. Britling Saw

MR. H. G. WELLS'S remarkable story, " r. Britling Sees It Through," which has l n running as a serial in Collier's Weekly, s just been concluded. Mr. Britling has endured e agonies of war, experiencing one perplexity, grief d loss after another, until, at length, his splendid n Hugh was slain. A chum of his son, a young Gern , has died of wounds in a prison camp. Mr. Britli is now writing a letter to the German boy's parent o accompany a violin which he had left at their h e at the end of a long residence with the English fan . Mr. Britling writes:

> What have we been fighting for? What are we fighting ? Do you know? Does any one know? Why am I spending t is left of my substance, and you what is left of yours, to p on this war against each other? What have we to gain n hurting one another still further? Why should we be pu ts any longer in the hands of crowned fools and witless diplon s, even if we were dumb and acquiescent before? Does not e blood of our sons now cry out to us that this foolery sh d cease? We have let these people send our sons to death.
> It is you and I who must stop these wars, these mass es of boys. Massacres of boys! That indeed is the essen f modern war, the killing off of the young. It is the destruc n of the human inheritance; it is the spending of all the life d material of the future upon present-day hate and greed.

One of the remarkable characteristics of Mr. We s story has been its general fairness toward his nati 's enemies. In this last chapter he seems for a mom nt to allow national prejudice to get the better of is even-handed justice, though he does indeed s e Great Britain only a little less vehemently t n Germany.

Of greatest significance is Mr. Britling's staten t of what it is that he really sees, now that he s "seen it through." He soliloquizes:

> I must write to them plainly.
> About God as I have found him.
> As he has found me.
> Yes. Religion is the first thing and the last thing, and il a man has found God and been found by God, he begi t no beginning, and he works to no end. He may hav is friendships, his partial loyalties, his scraps of honor. Bu ll these things fall into place and life falls into place only h God. Only with God. God, who fights through men ag st Blind Force, and Might, and Non-Existence; who is the l, who is Meaning. He is the only King. . . . Of course I st write about him. I must tell all my world about him. d before the coming of the true King, the inevitable King, e King who is present whenever just men foregather, this bl l- stained rubbish of the ancient world, these puny kings d tawdry emperors, the wily politicians and artful law s, these men who grab and trick and compel, these war-ma s and oppressors, will presently shrivel and pass, like paper th t into a flame.

By a singular coincidence, just as Mr. We s story is being finished, news comes that a flesh-a l- blood, not a fictitious, British journalist has re y been led through contemplation of the present w d disaster to the rest of faith. Horatio Bottom , editor of John Bull, who has been a pronou d and aggressive agnostic, announces that he has b n led by the horror of the war to faith in God and in e immortality of the soul.

"The war has revealed the futility and wicked s of man. We cannot believe God sent the war. e know God hates the war. But we must rejoice w n men looking out beyond the red fury of the war e God, and feel his steadying hand upon their souls. t was in this spirit that the Psalmist wrote long :

> God is our refuge and strength, a very present hel n trouble. Therefore will not we fear, though the eart e removed, and though the mountains be carried into the m st of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be trou l, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. e Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge.

Offers Himself as Slave

EADERS were startled last week by seeing this advertisement in a w York City daily newspaper: 'anted: A Master. Bright, ambitious ing man, excellent references, willing t work, will sell himself into slavery f his keep; I have got to eat; state t price." Investigation showed that t maker of this unusual offer was a brawny athlete of a lad nineteen years old and more than six feet tall. He had tried one kind of work after another and all without success until the pangs of hunger as he trudged New York's streets drove him to try and catch the attention of some employer by this unique proposal. It is a pitiable picture of the struggles that worthy young men often have in these days of heated competition. There are men who sell themselves to the servitude of moral evil and to one bad habit or another, and the cruel master lashes and oppresses his wretched slave. There is a blessed submission of ourselves to the mastery of Jesus Christ, to obey his will perfectly and to serve his kingdom. It was customary in olden times for the master to put his brand on the slave, and the apostle Paul refers to this habit in his complete submission of his life to Jesus Christ. "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." (Gal. 6 : 17.)

Man-Eating Shark Tragedies

[Photographs show citizens watching the hunt for sharks in Matawan Creek, N. J., where a man and a boy were killed; and a 220-pound shark captured off the New Jersey coast.]

ON July 3 E. Van Sant of Philadelphia was killed by a shark at Beach Haven, N. J., and Charles Bruder met a similar fate at Spring Lake, N. J., on July 8. On July 12, a worse tragedy occurred in little Matawan Creek, N. J. A shark killed a boy, Lester Stillwell, and Stanley Fisher, one of the leading young men of Matawan, and seriously injured a boy, Joseph Dunn. The attack was not made on young Stillwell until the boy was on a ladder leading from the water to the roadbed of the dock. A witness to the tragedy says: "Matawan Creek at that point is not more than twenty feet broad and Stanley Fisher proposed that we weight chicken wire with stones and sink it in the channel to keep the shark in. We did this from rowboats. The next thing I knew Fisher was in a bathing suit and was diving for Stillwell's body from the dock. Fisher was in midchannel, and Smith and Burlow were near him. When he was seized he was treading water at the time, and all at once we noticed a swirl of water. Fisher had young Stillwell's body in his arms at the time He was crying for help. 'The shark has got me!' " Fisher was rescued by men in a boat and hurried to the Monmouth Memorial Hospital at Long Branch, where he soon expired from loss of blood from the wounds. It is thought that the shark took the body of Stillwell away from Fisher. Young Joseph Dunn was bathing from the brick company's wharf about half a mile below the Wyckoff dock. This was fully an hour after chicken wire netting had been strung across Matawan Creek channel before the attack upon Fisher. The boy was climbing up the ladder from the water to the brickyard pier, like Stillwell, when he also was attacked. He will have a fight for his life. This ought to be the last of the man-eating shark tragedies. The last slaughters were within sight of Staten Island, a part of Greater New York. The good citizens of this region of the Atlantic coast have become thoroughly aroused and are hunting down these tigers of the sea. A number of them have been caught and killed. There must be greater caution in bathing and a better patrol. There are moral dangers as deadly as these man-eating sharks, and these by watching and prayer can be escaped. The unexpected suddenness with which these persons were hurried out of life suggests the great importance of remembering these words: "There is but a step between me and death." (I Sam. 20 : 3.)

Operators Become Presidents

A RECENT daily notes the fact that of the new railroad presidents chosen this summer three are men who had begun as telegraph operators. They are Bernet of the Nickel Plate, Calvin of the Union Pacific, and Levers of the Western Pacific. A wider investigation shows that many of the largest roads are managed by men who came through the course from this same beginning. Among these are the Canadian Pacific, Northwestern, New York Central, Pennsylvania, Grand Trunk, and a number more. Many have made a much humbler start as telegraph messenger boys. There is nothing magical about this change from an operator to a president. If it came about in a day it would be counted a romantic freak of our democratic society, but accomplished through years of unremitting and faithful performance of duty rewarded by new duties ever enlarging and new burdens ever increasing it shows itself the only reasonable method for training men and fitting them for the heavy responsibilities of a great office. There is no better way to reach the top than to do each day the duties that lie next at hand. In doing them we are fitted for tasks as yet beyond our powers. Christ set forth this accepted principle of our industrial world by his parable of the Talents: "Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things." (Matt. 25 : 23.)

He Saw World Changes

BENJAMIN DOANE, aged ninety-three, recently died at Bayonne, N. J. In 1837 he went to sea in a sailing vessel, and was later captain on several lines of steamships. In the early forties he visited Japan before that country was opened to foreign trade. Within the experience of this old sea-captain there was evolved the whole process of development from the most primitive modes of navigation to the most modern. He saw and kept up with all the changes from sails to steam and electricity. But more than this, his life spanned the entire history of the awakened East. Since he risked his life in the forties by stopping at a port of the hermit Japan there has sprung full-grown into the life of the nations the new Japan; and China, the sleeping giant, has roused herself to play her part in the future history of the world. Progress is Christian. Jesus came to usher in a new heaven and a new earth, and whatever looks toward the awakening and the unfolding of a better life has stamped upon it his own seal. He came to give light and life to men and nations. "I am the Light of the world." (John 9 : 5.)

Remembered His Mother

THE real reason the late William H. Godair, real estate operator of Chicago, left $400,000 for an old people's home in Cook County was made known yesterday when the deposition of G. H. Connell of Fort Worth, Texas, reached the executors of the estate. "Mr. Godair told me one day that he had amply provided for his wife and family," said Connell. "He said he was going to leave a large sum to found an old people's home because his mother had lived and died in poverty. He said he was unable to give financial assistance to her in his younger life, and this followed him all through life. He always intended to do something for some one else's mother. He never forgot how his mother worked." Alfred formed the British nation, but the women of Britain have made it what it is. Bismarck and William fashioned the German states into a mighty empire, but the intelligence, virtue and piety of the mothers made Germany great. In our own land it is the same. Washington who founded and Lincoln who saved the republic are what their mothers made them, and each has paid loving, grateful tribute to his mother. The real queens of this land are the mothers who have had to work hard to feed, clothe, and educate their children, and in our land of democracy and of opportunity they have seen their sons and daughters come up as real princes and princesses, through their toil and sacrifice. Mr. Godair has set a beautiful example: "Honor thy father and thy mother." (Ex. 20 : 12.)

IN the interest of historical accuracy a correction should be made in the story about the Grant Monument which appeared here in the issue of May 24. Statement was made to the effect that General Grant refused to accept the sword of General Lee. History does not substantiate this. In fact, it is understood that Grant did not ask the sword of Lee nor did Lee offer it.

America's Poet-Laureate

The Poet and his dearest friends

I cannot say, and I will not say,
That he is dead. He is just away.

JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY, who died from a stroke of paralysis at his home in Indianapolis on July 22, was far more than the poet of childhood, as he is so often called. He was the Poet-Laureate of America. He interpreted America's heart to itself. He has brought tears to the eyes of the American people, laughter to their lips; he has kept love and simplicity in their souls. It would do every business man in America good to read every morning before he goes to work:

Le's go a-visitin' back to Griggsby's station—
Back where we ust' be so happy and so pore.

Even the mothers, sons and daughters should read it:

Pap's got his patent right, and rich as all creation;
But where's the peace and comfort that we all had before?

While his body was lying in state in the capitol at Indianapolis, people all over the United States were going to their bookshelves and taking down the worn, loved volumes of his verses to look again at the lines they have known so long; or going about their work they recalled lines and stanzas of his that they have read and repeated until they have become fixed in memory.

"Knee-Deep in June," "Out to Old Aunt Mary's," "The Ole Swimmin' Hole," "An Old Sweetheart of Mine," "When the Frost is on the Pumpkin," "Good-by, Jim," "Old October"—how the lines come flocking back, singing themselves in the hearts so often over-tempted to forget the ways of simplicity and peace.

In his child poems it is hard to say which of the two kinds exhibited the more perfect art, those written for children, like "Little Orphant Annie," "The Raggedy Man," "The Little Man in the Tin Shop," or those written for grown-ups about children. Of the latter the greatest are those mourning the death of little ones gone, like "The Little Coat," "Little Wesley," "Condolence." He knew the anguish of parents longing for the little forms that had vanished and the little voices stilled. He saw heaven through the gate that the children had entered. The mother grieving over "The Little Coat" notes:

The pockets—homes were they
Of the little hands that play
Now no more—but, absent, thus Beckon us.

But he felt that after all his own grief was greater:

May I come in where you sit weeping, aye,
May I, who have not any child to die,
Weep with you for the little one whose love
I know nothing of?

BUT for the most part his lines were filled with laughter. Perhaps the most typical poem of his immense output is that rollicking song, "Hoosier Spring Poetry:"

When ever'thing's a-goin' like she's got a-goin' now,
When things is goin' this away, w'y, that's the sign, you know,
That ever'thing's a-goin' like we like to see her go!

James Whitcomb Riley had a truly religious nature and a real religious faith. One of his less known poems, "Rubaiyat of Doc Sifers," is full of the expressions of faith. He may not have been in every respect thoroughly orthodox, but his songs were in tune with the songs of heaven. These lines from "The Shower" might have occurred in the rhapsodies of Isaiah:

While I, transfigured by some wondrous art,
  Bowed with the thirsty lilies to the sod,
My empty soul brimmed over, and my heart
  Drenched with the love of God.

The same spirit of determined, sunny faith that breathes in "The Contented Farmer" is found in many more serious and more formal lines:

  Knowing I love you as sun the sod
On the ripening side of the great round earth
  That swings in the smile of God.

Faith, resignation, hope and the understanding of children are all in the wistful poem, "The Happy Little Cripple," the poor little chap who had "curv'ture of the spine." The same sympathy and faith are in his great poem telling of the unanswered prayer of "The Christ." Much of the Gospel, too, is in the weird poem "Krist Kindel." Again he sings plaintively, exercising what Professor James calls the will to believe, "We Must Believe," each stanza of which poem ends with the fervent words,

Lord, I believe:
  Help thou mine unbelief!

How true it is today:

He may, at last, seem worn—
  Lie fallen—hands and eyes
Folded—yet, though we mourn and mourn,
  A good man never dies.

He prayed for all the world:

And with all the sorrowing,
  Oh, divide, I pray
This vast treasure of content
  That is mine today.

Here is the text of his life, the essage that he, now in that unseen nd, would have us make surest nc to forget:

Were not shine and shower blent
As the gracious Master sent?
We should temper our content
  With his own.
For we know not every morrow can be d.
So forgetting all the sorrows we have l,
Let us fold away our fears
And put by our foolish tears,
    And through all the coming rs,
      Just be glad.

THERE will be new p nos for all of us the ext time we have the rare o ortunity of lying dow in the thick, deep grasses nd looking up through idsummer's thick, rich l es. We shall recall how h described those summer dr ns, suggesting,

        Pull
Yer straw hat acrost yer ey
And peek through it at the ies.
Thinkin' of old chums 'at's d,
  Maybe smilin' back at yo
In betwixt the beautiful
  Clouds o' gold and whit nd blue!

As to his biography, i an be told in a dozen w ds. His life was his art. He ld not tell the precise ye of his birth, but his friend believe that 1853 was the c ect date. His father was a la ver and planned that his on should enter that profe on, but the young man "wa not disobedient to the hea ly vision." Before many ars had passed in roving, m ng his living first as a gn painter, he "found hir lf" in his art. Yale made im a Master of Arts in 1902 he University of Pennsyl nia gave him a degree of D tor of Letters in 1904; Indiana Unive ty, that of Doctor of Laws in 1907. His writings and his readings brought l a considerable fortune, and in 191 he presented to the city of Indiana lis property valued at $75,000 to b he site of a Public Library and S ool Administration Building. Like itier, he never married. But all he childhood of America he took t his heart. Children were always his cl est companions. "Riley Day" was lebrated throughout the nation st October. In Indiana the day was de a holiday. School children from ry part of the United States sent him ve messages, and great men of this nd other lands sent him personal assur es of their affection and respect.

Nuggets of News from Church and Camp and Mission

A PLAN of Union, which has been under discussion for some time among the Norwegian Lutherans in America, has been adopted by the Norwegian Synod, representing 98,188 members, and the United Norwegian Church, representing 171,657 members. The Hauge Synod, which initiated the movement toward union, is expected to subscribe to the articles of union, although a recent vote taken by the synod, while showing a small majority for the plan, developed enough opposition to delay final action. The Hauge Synod represents 39,748 members, and if the three synods complete the contemplated union the united church will have 309,593 confirmed members and will rank in the Lutheran world of America next in size to the General Synod, which has 348,194 members. The union of the two churches will become effective in 1917, the year of the Lutheran quadricentenary, and will eliminate much competition and friction which in the past has resulted in many Norwegian people leaving the church entirely or joining other communions. The union will also make possible the consolidation of many small congregations.

NINE hundred and three American and foreign students, including leaders and visitors, assembled at College Camp, Lake Geneva, Wis., from June 16 to 25, for the twenty-seventh annual Student Conference of the Middle West, comprising Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota and Wisconsin. The Conference was notable for the stand taken against gambling, profanity and other social excesses in the educational institutions, not only in the Middle West but throughout the nation. A Committee was appointed to consider the moral condition of the colleges and universities.

THE Young Women's Christian Association of Erie, Pa., received $190,000 for a new building as a bequest in the will of the late merchant, W. B. Trask. Mr. Trask also bequeathed $50,000 to the Hamot Hospital of Erie, $5,000 to the American Bible Society, and $17,000 to various charities. The total estate was about $700,000.

SINCE its organization in 1852 the Congregational Church Building Society has assisted in the completing of 4,687 church buildings and 1,246 parsonages in fifty-two states and territories, including Alaska and Hawaii. The funds of the society, available for loans or conditional gifts, now total $1,192,921. The first grant from the treasury of the society was to the First Congregational Church of Omaha, Neb., then, in 1857, a struggling mission on the frontier. The banner year of the society was 1914, in which year 3,299 churches contributed $309,097 and there were erected 131 churches and 36 parsonages. In 1915 a debt-clearing campaign lifted from 100 churches mortgages amounting to more than $400,000. Since 1852 the society has received for its work $7,938,659.

AFTER forty-two years of service as a missionary in Burma, relieved only by occasional furloughs, Rev. B. P. Cross has again returned to his station at Tavey on the Bay of Bengal, according to the Boston Transcript. Mr. Cross, who is commissioned by the American Baptist Foreign Missionary Society, serves a territory 350 miles long and 75 miles wide and though now seventy years old hopes to round out a service of fifty years on the field. Mr. Cross works among the Karen people, who were once subject to the Burmese. Speaking of these people, "It is interesting to note why the Karens embrace Christianity so readily," said Mr. Cross. "They have legends, and one of these is that the Karens once had a book which they lost. It was predicted that a white man would arrive with a book, and that the Karens would accept it and some day the Karens would be a great nation. It was, therefore, easy to understand why they welcomed the English and the Bible some years ago."

THE Christian Herald is advised by the superintendent of the Bethesda Leper Colony in Dutch Guiana that two girls who were kept back for further observati in October, 1915, when the girl Antoinnett on Hekelon was reported healed from le sy. have been cured and given permission to r rn to their families. The two girls most re tly healed are Nellie Deira and Evangelin on Hekelon, who have spent respectively fo nd seven years at Bethesda. They have en treated for four years with aiouni (a ulmoogra oil mixture).

THE REV. A. G. After the addresses the compan enjoyed an inspection of the entire plant. ou should have heard the remarks as they nt from one strange sight to another. M of them had never dreamed that there were ich comforts and conveniences. The hot an old water accommodations took the Japanes nd the well-heated rooms without visible fir ok the Koreans. The immaculate beds, pol ed floors, spotless white-painted walls and ilings, gave us all a great lesson in cleanl ss. It was also a great marvel to them all at some one of another race, living away in America, should think enough of them to ve the funds to make possible all these con rts and conveniences."

Alice in Wonderland

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

I WAS attending the first exhibition of the Alice in Wonderland motion pictures. I had come into the small cool little theater from the heat and dust of roadway, but as I watched Alice—the same Alice that Lewis Carrol made famous—wandering through the very marvelous forests and gardens of a very marvelous wonderland, I forgot that Broadway with its dust and heat and noise was so near. I saw the White Rabbit and the Wolves and the Carpenter all come to life as I had dreamed them when I was a child. I saw the Gryphon, and the Dormouse, and the Mock Turtle, and the Blue Caterpillar. I saw the Mad Hatter and the March Hare and Tweedledum and Tweedledee. I saw the Duchess, and the King and Queen, and the Cheshire Cat.

The scene impressed me especially. Alice, running away from the crowd, comes to a little forest. Near the edge of said forest, sitting on the lowest branch of the lowest tree, she spies the Cheshire Cat. She stops and speaks to him.

"Which way do I go?" she questions anxiously.

The Cheshire Cat looks dreamily up through the lovely, sun-splattered leaves. Then,

"Where do you want to go?" he questions languidly.

Alice seems to be thinking hard. At last she speaks.

"Why," she says, "it doesn't matter as long as I get somewhere!"

The Cheshire Cat curls up lazily on the lowest branch of the lowest tree. After a moment his answer comes, triumphantly.

"Well, you'll get there if you only walk long enough!" says the Cheshire Cat.

And so Alice wanders away through the wonderful forest. And in time she comes to many strange places, for, by walking long enough, she gets somewhere. And then finally she wakes up with a start and discovers that she had been dreaming. . . .

And the audience gave a pleased sigh and woke up too. And, because it was a grown-up audience, it knew that it, too, had been dreaming of the days when wonderlands were real and the city with its heat and noise was make-believe.

ON the way home after the lights had flashed up and the wonderland folk had gone back to dwell between the covers of the green and gold book, I remembered, most of all, the conversation between Alice and the Cheshire Cat.

"It doesn't matter," said Alice, "where I go—as long as I get somewhere!"

"Well," answered the Cheshire Cat, "you'll get there if you only walk long enough!"

I ONCE knew a girl who wanted to go to college. All through her primary and grammar school days her dream had been with her, and when she finally reached high school she still longed for the fulfilment of it. But money was not so very plentiful in her family and going to college would mean many little personal sacrifices—no pretty clothes, no spending money, nothing but her tuition and the bare necessities. So during the third year of high school the girl suddenly dropped out of her classes and went to work in a doctor's office.

"Why are you leaving now?" questioned her teachers. "You love your school so; why don't you keep on with your studies? You have the best record in the class."

"Oh, what's the use?" the girl answered wearily. "If I go to college I'll have to give up so many things that I can't enjoy myself. It costs so very much just to get in! It's better to give up the idea now and take a position."

So the girl went into her work sadly, with the fragments of her broken dream piled neatly in the darkest corner of her heart.

Next year came—the year that would have seen the girl's graduation from high school. And toward the end of it, as final examinations were coming on, the Board of Education announced what they had long been keeping a secret. They announced that the two students—a boy and a girl—with the highest marks for the four years of high school would receive scholarships to college.

A few days later when the girl was coming home from work she met the winner of the girl's scholarship. Congratulations were hard to voice, but she managed them.

"It must be wonderful," she said finally, "to know that you are really going to college. I've always wanted to—" Her voice broke, and she didn't finish.

The winner of the scholarship was kind—more than that, she was a good friend. She laid her hand on the girl's arm.

"I know how you wanted to go," she said softly, "and I wish that you were going in my place. . . . Isn't there any way?"

The girl shook her head. "I couldn't make up the work that I missed," she answered. "I couldn't! I haven't touched a book for over a year!"

"I'm sorry," said the other girl. "If you'd only kept on! Why, you were at the head of the class. You would have won!"

THAT girl was an Alice, wandering in a strange, vague wonderland—a wonderland made up of forests and winding paths. She lost her way and didn't know where to go, and there was no friendly, grinning Cheshire Cat to tell her to keep on walking. So she stopped walking and gave up—and was mighty sorry afterward.

We are all Alices, at one time or another. It doesn't matter whether we're boys or girls or men or women. It doesn't matter whether we're six, or sixteen, or sixty years old. At some time we're bound to come to a place when we will be forced to ask, as Alice asked, "Which way do I go?"

Perhaps it will be business, or home affairs, or religion that is puzzling us. Perhaps there will be two paths to choose from, or perhaps there will be a perfect labyrinth of roads, or perhaps we will have to blaze our own trail through the trackless forest of a vast wonderland. And, very likely, there won't be any Cheshire Cat to give advice and directions.

WHEN you were tiny did you ever follow a rainbow? It was always just beyond, over the top of the next hill or around the next curve in the road. So finally you—being tiny—grew tired, and gave up, and went home.

Did you ever feel that had you walked a bit farther—only a bit—you might have reached the end—and found the pot of gold?

Oh, friends of mine, when you come to the place where you are tired and lost and a bit puzzled and maybe a little discouraged, don't give up! If you come to the forest of doubt where you have to ask the way, don't get discouraged because there isn't someone to point out your road to you. Remember the Cheshire Cat's advice to Alice, and you'll find that it holds good in most any case.

"W*ell, you'll get there if you only walk long enough!*" said the Cheshire Cat blandly.

You'll get there if you only walk long enough! That's the secret of success—any kind of success—I think! The Napoleons, and the Washingtons, and the Lincolns of this world had to do some walking before they reached their goal. Look into the lives of great people—your own special hero or heroine, for instance—and see if they didn't have to do a bit of hard traveling before they became great.

And then, while your soul and heart are full of brave deeds and great courage and beautiful thoughts, look into your own lives and see if you can't get somewhere—if you only walk long enough. You'll find that you can.

Fresh from the fields—

That is how we get them. Solid, juicy, sun-ripened tomatoes right off the vines.

They are raised in the famous tomato-growing district of Southern New Jersey.

The Campbell establishment is in the same territory and within easy reach, so that we receive these fine tomatoes without delay and in sound and perfect condition for

Campbell's Tomato Soup

We blend their pure delicious juice with other nourishing materials of the best quality which can be obtained, regardless of their cost.

You wouldn't ask for choicer butter on your table than we use in this soup, nor finer granulated sugar, nor anything better than our home-grown parsley and celery.

Good soup once a day at least is a most efficient aid to digestion and robust health.

This is just as important in summer as in any other season. And this wholesome appetizing Campbell "kind" is one of the best means toward keeping the system in condition to withstand oppressive heat.

Prepare it as a cream of tomato according to the easy directions on the label. You will say you never tasted anything more satisfying.

Hupmobile

THE business that endures is the sound, strong business, whose customers keep on coming back. Judged by that high standard, the Hupmobile shows a record that few, if any, can rival.

Figures just compiled from our service station statistics prove that it is unique in the number of those who repeat their orders from year to year.

And the latest, freshest figures prove that high-price and low-price—four cylinders and multi-cylinders—are equally powerless to influence 50 8-10 per cent. of our sales.

In other words, more than half of all Hupmobile owners keep on buying, year after year.
Stop and think of the powers of resistance—the superiorities—the Hupmobile must possess to hold these owners to their allegiance.

Millions of dollars are expended to tempt them away. The lure of a lower price on the one hand; confusing claims of multi-cylinder performance on the other. But the 50 per cent. phalanx stands fast year after year.

Convinced, in the one case, that a lower price cannot compensate for the loss of Hupmobile goodness.
Convinced, in the other case, that more cylinders can add nothing to that Hupmobile efficiency which eleven thousand owners have rated at 99 per cent.
And convinced, in the last instance, that no other car can yield better performance.

Hupmobile free-coupon service provides care, inspections and adjustments each month for eight months, at any one of more than 5,000 service stations. The owner receives the coupons, without extra cost, when he buys his car.

one has only to modify the opinion given by the reasons for bias on the part of the persons giving it. When, for example, it was complained that the wicked revolutionists had disturbed the common people so that household servants had begun to feel that they had rights as regards wages and notice, that laborers had been allowed to organize into syndicates, one began to feel that the revolution was achieving something of value. Atrocities beyond extenuation were to be found in the use of the mansion of Delatore, the son-in-law of Diaz, as police headquarters, and of the beautiful Jockey Club as the meeting place of the labor unions.

No one who knows Mexico and has been without financial interests in the country has ever been in doubt that a radical change amounting to a revolution was needed. The evils of the old régime were great and flagrant. The only question was whether this particular movement was going to effect the change and provide the remedy.

The first great reform which Mr. Carranza has brought into operation shows the temper and good faith of what he is doing. It is the abolition of the federal district and the freeing of the municipalities. The significance of this is difficult for an American to grasp. Throughout Latin-America from the Rio Grande to Cape Horn, the distinguishing feature in the political organization is the Jefe Politico. Imagine a country organized by states and municipalities or departments, corresponding to counties, and then suppose that traversing the municipalities are districts ruled by officials comparable to United States marshals, responsible only to the federal government and with practically unlimited power. The Jefe Politico, controlling the police, drawing recruits for the army, supervising the elections, is the agent by which a central tyranny is able to work out its plans in detail and make them applicable to any part of the country without consideration of local authority. It must be understood that so long as this institution was maintained, constitutional government could never be more than a pretense. By its abolition Mr. Carranza has made a civil dictatorship practically impossible.

The attitude of the revolution to the church has been the subject of a long campaign of misrepresentation which forms the basis of a concerted attack by the Catholics of this country upon Mr. Wilson's policy. The atrocities of which the Carranzistas have been accused are insignificant and negligible. It was necessary that the high ecclesiastical dignitaries should cease to dominate the political life of the country; their resentment was to be expected. The provisional government has declared that there is to be no new legislation with reference to the church, that the whole situation is adequately defined by the reform laws of Juarez which fell into abeyance under the dictatorship. Under these laws the church owns no property, but is a tenant of the state. In this way Mexico foreshadowed the principle by which France arrived at her solution of the separation problem. The Catholic clergy suffers no curtailment of its proper moral and religious function. The state claims the right, as do all other nations, to make provision outside the church for such matters as marriage, divorce and education.

While the general political aims of the revolution have been the concern of the more intellectual members of the Mexican community, a comparatively small proportion of the population, there is one respect in which the movement has affected the very lowest strata. If one asks a few common soldiers, chosen at random, what they are fighting for, the majority will answer that they are fighting to gain access to the land. Mexico is a country of great landholders, with the dispossessed common people until lately tied to the land in a form of serfdom. In the old days the land was held in the community method of ownership, worked in common, with a common participation in the benefits. A long chapter of Mexican economic history is needed to describe the process by which the Indians were dispossessed. It began in colonial days, but developed into a profusion of corrupt and unjust practices under the Diaz dictatorship. Every rural Mexican carries a rankling sense of injustice. Madero's success was partly due to the fact that he enlisted this element of discontent; it was also partly his undoing, for he found himself unable to fulfil his promise of the restoration of land and thereby lost much of his support.

THE program of Mr. Carranza contains agrarian reform as one of its cardinal elements. The situation is in a measure simplified by the voluntary exile of the more reactionary hacendados. Their peons settled quietly on the land, and have received the benefits of their labor for the first time in their generation. Mr. Carranza has already promulgated a decree by which there is to be a testing of the great landowners' titles, and, if there is evidence of injustice in the acquisition of lands, the ownership of these lands is to be vested again in the communities that originally owned them. Certain great estates will probably be confiscated and divided, but Mr. Carranza has no great sympathy with confiscation as a policy. In addition, a land tax is proposed which would be graduated so as to bear lightly on the small holder, but to make ownership of great estates an impossibility. The leaders of the revolution have not yet seen the great desirability of a uniform rate which will collect from the land-holders according to the value of the land.

The final group of reforms, which remain to be carried out, and through which Mexico will encounter her most serious difficulties, express the very essence of the revolutionary movement. They represent the intention to secure the economic independence of the country. The whole civil struggle has been a war upon the concession system with its political, economic and social ramifications. It is a little difficult for an American to see the situation clearly. No other country in modern times has been so continuously or consistently bled by foreigners as Mexico. When Cortez landed at the port which was to be Vera Cruz and received the rich presents brought by the emissaries of Montezuma, he sent word to that prince that he and his companions suffered from "a disease of the heart that could only be cured by gold." From that day to this almost every foreigner who has entered Mexico has been a sufferer from the same complaint. From that day to this Mexican wealth has gone in a constant stream to foreign countries. The boat on which I came from Vera Cruz brought something like twenty-five tons of silver mined in time of revolution.

I was given copies of the contracts by which Lord Cowdray's company obtained their oil rights. Their provisions were of such a character that a little while before the beginning of the European war, Lord Charles Beresford, a representative of extreme conservatism, declared in the House of Commons that it was a disgrace for the citizens of any civilized country to be party to that contract. In addition to almost unrestricted rights of exploitation of oil, the Cowdray interests hold two and a half million hectares of land, port works, the Tehuantepec Railway, and most of the electric lighting and tramway systems of the republic. The tentacles of this company have entwined themselves about the whole economic body of Mexico. American interests, all more or less privileged, aggregate, it is said, a billion dollars. The whole intent of the revolution is to end a system by which the natural resources of the country are drained by foreign capitalists grown accustomed to expect extravagant returns. Naturally, the only way in which this reform could be reached was by the destruction of the Diaz régime.

MEXICO CITY is a curious place. Like Washington, it is only a capital. Under Diaz it was the home of the Cientificos. This group began its existence as a scientific society and ended by being a political economic conspiracy. The individuals composing it serv as go-betweens, receiving and deliv ng concessions and bribes. The sellin ut of Mexico was the Diaz régime, an he population of Mexico City stood nd still stands for this system. It w to be expected that the great Cient cos would go abroad for the sake of eir health, but Mexico City is full of tle ones, relatives and stenographers, ho maintain an unbroken sentime of hostility to the purposes of the re lution. Their function is to intrig to lower prestige, to undermine credi nd to refuse supplies. It is a curiou act that a revolution has been fough for five years over the greater porti of the republic at the cost of 100,000 ves and incalculable destruction of prop ty, while the real objective of the ole movement has continued untou ed. That objective is the traitoro in-triguing Cientifico population of M ico City. This serves to explain wh Mr. Carranza has preferred to rul the country from Querétaro or fr a railway train. The elimination the concession-mongers does not, how er, mean the elimination of the conce on-holders. Here Mexico enters the rcle of troubled international relation and here the problem of the United ates defines itself.

When President Wilson's M bile speech announced that his policy ith reference to the Latin-American ates would be to aid them in freeing em-selves from foreign concessions, ere were few who understood that h was placing his finger upon the most tral and significant of international rel ion-ships. That statement began new chapter in world politics.

The Year's Tabernacle Revivals

By W. S. REASONER

WHEN the first evangelists proclaimed the risen Lord, the pulpit was pitched in the marketplace and the listeners stood under the open sky; nor did the apostles ever cease to address the people in the open although they never missed an opportunity to be heard in the synagogue, or temple, or home, or jail, or palace. And all through the ages the Peters and Savonarolas and Luthers and Wesleys have gathered followers under the spreading skies and along the dusty highways. Evangelists still preach in square and park and open field; but the summer is short and the winter is too valuable to lose and the people, whether just or not, avoid the churches, so that we have developed in America a new evangelist, the tabernacle evangelist, who preaches in a great temporary timber structure to people who crowd through board benches and who press down the sawdust covered aisles to acknowledge their newly awakened faith in the same Saviour whose spirit moved at Pentecost.

THERE are today almost four hundred members of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists, with a central office in Winona Lake, Indiana, where they meet annually in August. The year just past has seen many campaigns, some of them remarkable for their results in the face of the opposition under which they were inaugurated and carried on.

Billy Sunday closed his season's work Sunday, June 18, in Kansas City, Mo. In Mr. Sunday's five campaigns in Omaha, Neb., Syracuse, N. Y., Trenton, N. J., Baltimore, Md., and Kansas City, Mo., the converts number 94,511, and the free-will offerings amounted to $147,347.26. In twenty-seven of his most notable campaigns, including the figures of this year, Billy Sunday's trail-hitters number 332,013, and the free-will offerings total $494,034. On the third of September, he begins his next season's work in Detroit, he goes to Boston on October 22. Other engagements for next year will include Chicago, Buffalo, and possibly New York.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and Mr. Charles Alexander are entering upon the [illegible] year of their labors together. For the past season they have labored at Davidson College, N. C., Asheville, N. C., Brattleboro, Vt., Springfield, Ill., Washington and Jefferson College, Washington, Pa., Wilmington, N. C., and Keene, N. H. They do not give out the number of conversions; but the reports from all the cities indicate very large accessions to the churches.

One special feature of Mr. Chapman's work is the appeal to young men and young women in the interests of the mission field at home and abroad and the gospel ministry. During the year, as a result of this emphasis, more than two hundred and fifty young men offered themselves for the ministry, and more than six hundred young women offered themselves for the mission field.

DR. MILFORD HALL LYON in the last evangelistic year held meetings in larger cities than he had formerly served and achieved comparable results. Meetings were held in Lansing, Mich., Flint, Mich., Wilmington, Del., Spokane, Wash., Calumet and Laurium, Mich. It is estimated that about ten thousand people joined the churches as a result of the year's work out of 18,991 who signed decision cards. In one city there was a change of about eight hundred votes from the wet to the dry side. Dr. Lyon begins the next season on September at Winona, Minn.; from there he goes to Camden, N. J., on October 22, and to Portland, Me., December 31.

George Wood Anderson and party were engaged this year in work at Bellefontaine, Ohio, Easton, Pa., Columbus, Ohio (North Side), Jackson, Mich., Bridgeton, N. J.; registered conversions and reconsecrations numbering over 20,000. As a result of a special plea at a Thursday morning parlor meeting, the society women of Jackson, Mich., organized a Florence Crittenton House for girls. Special attention is given to the boys' and girls' work under the leadership of Mr. Frank B. Lane.

Edward Biederwolf and party closed a six weeks' campaign at Plainfield, N. J., toward the end of May. The converts numbered 5,570, the largest number he has had in his nineteen years of evangelistic work. The converts were classified as follows: Decisions, 2,021; reconsecrations, 3,215; children under twelve, 334. Other campaigns this year were in the Panama Exposition Tabernacle; Lockport, N. Y.; York, Pa. Campaigns for Dr. Biederwolf next year will include San José, Calif.; Sacremento, Calif.; Wilkinsburg, Pa.; and Lawrence, Mass.

Henry W. Stough completed the evangelistic season on the 18th of June when he closed his Knoxville, Tenn., campaign. Dr. Stough, with a party of eight workers, opened in Lebanon, Pa., September 1. After the Lebanon campaign he left Pennsylvania for the first time in three years and held a campaign in Buffalo, N. Y. On leaving Buffalo, he went to Atlantic City, N. J., with a party of twelve people, where the result of the campaign was seen in the defeat of a political machine. From Atlantic City, Dr. Stough went to Tampa, Fla. Here, too, his meetings touched the civic conscience of the people and a reform ticket was nominated at the June primary. After Tampa, Dr. Stough moved on to Knoxville, Tenn., where the trail-hitters numbered 3,000. He opens his next fall's work in Evansville, Ind.

Rev. I. E. Honeywell, who for four years was Billy Sunday's assistant, but for the past ten years has been conducting campaigns of his own, opened his season's work last fall at Ilion, N. Y., in a union tabernacle campaign on September 5. From there he went to Oneida, N. Y., and then to Homestead, Pa. Since January 2, he has been at Shamokin, Pa., Rome, N. Y., Huntington, Ind., Santa Rosa, Calif., Petaluma, Calif. Mr. Honeywell begins his next evangelistic year at Muskegon, Michigan. The conversions resulting from his work in the six campaigns of the year number about 12,000. About 25 per cent. were already church members. At Oneida, N. Y., 40 per cent. of all the men employed in the Oneida Steel and Pulley Works were converted, and they have a most enthusiastic men's Bible club now, which meets in a room in the factory, which has been especially fitted up for them. At Rome, N. Y., also, some of the manufacturers have fitted up rooms for their men's Bible clubs.

Bob Jones, the fiery young evangelist from Montgomery, Ala., who since his selection as the annual preacher at the Cartersville, Ga., tabernacle has been frequently referred to as the successor of Sam Jones and as the Billy Sunday of the South, began his 1915-16 work in Mansfield, Ohio, in September. From Mansfield he went to Joplin, Mo., then to Aurora, Ill., and Connellsville, Pa. The final campaign for this season was in Gloversville, N. Y. Conversions and reconsecrations in these campaigns numbered over 12,000.

THE evangelists Hart and Magann of Madison, Wis., during the past year conducted campaigns at Grand Junction, Colo.; Oshkosh, Wis.; Elgin, Ill.; Batavia, N. Y.; and Troy, N. Y. The year was a strenuous one. At Grand Junction, on the County Day, a flying squadron of the evangelistic party, chorus choir and pastors went into the surrounding towns and the evangelists gave ten addresses resulting in over one hundred and fifty conversions. Elgin, Ill., was in the midst of a campaign against the saloon, and the

The Car That Experts Buy

Over 55,000 men are now driving Mitchell cars built under John W. Bate, the genius in efficiency.

Most of them, our dealers say, seem to know mechanics. Many are noted engineers.

That seems to be so the world over.

Mitchell owners are largely experts. Now we wish to argue that this engineers' car is the car for laymen, too.

Look for a Lifetime Car

What these experts seek is a lifetime car. And that is what you should seek. Five years have proved that this Light Six type is going to be the car of the future. Men who buy that type today should buy their cars to keep.

Mr. Bate, in the Mitchell, has aimed at a lifetime car. All of his standards call for 50 per cent over-strength.

There are 440 parts in the Mitchell which are either drop-forged or steel-stamped. They are three times as strong as castings.

All the main strains are met with Chrome-Vanadium steel. He uses a wealth of it. The Bate cantilever springs have a perfect record. Not one has ever broken.

As a result of these standards, one Bate-Built Mitchell has run 218,734 miles. Six have averaged 164,372 miles each, or more than 30 years of ordinary service.

You get these standards at the Mitchell price because of this wonderful factory. It was built and equipped by Mr. Bate to build this car at minimum cost. It has cut our factory cost 50 per cent. When you can get so much of extra value, don't you think that you should take it?

Extras Without Cost

You also get in the Mitchell 26 extra features which other cars omit. They will cost us this year over $2,000,000. And each is something you would miss.

In this Mid-Year Mitchell you get the most complete car, the most up-to-date car that's shown. It has 73 attractions—new ideas and touches—which our early-spring model lacked.

Mitchell bodies are finished in 22 coats. They are upholstered in French-finished leather. They have a light in the tonneau, a locked compartment for valuables—every dainty appointment known.

The Mitchell is known as "The Engineers' Car," because of mechanical perfections. But these things, we argue, should appeal to every man who buys a fine car.

How Balanced Meals Build Better Brains and Bodies

By Arthur True Buswell, M. D.

EUGENE CHRISTIAN

AT LAST we Americans are beginning to wake up to the full meaning of the recent remarkable discoveries made by the food scientists. And it is time we did, for I firmly believe that the meals we eat every day cause more sickness and destroy more of our mental efficiency than all the drugs, alcohol, and tobacco combined.

To eat good, simple, nourishing food is not necessarily to eat correctly. In the first place, many of the foods which we have come to regard as good are in reality about the worst things we can eat, while others that we regard as harmful have the most food value.

But perhaps the greatest harm which comes from eating blindly is the fact that very often two perfectly good foods when eaten at the same meal form a chemical reaction in the stomach and literally explode, liberating dangerous toxics which are absorbed by the blood and form the root of nearly all sickness, the first indications of which are acidity, fermentation, gas, constipation, and many other sympathetic ills leading to most serious consequences.

These truths have been strongly brought out by Professor Metchnikoff in his treatise on the "Prolongation of Life," and by many other modern scientists. But most efforts in the past have been designed solely to cleanse out the system and remove the poisons after they had formed, wholly disregarding the cause.

Correct Eating involves, first, the proper selection of foods; second, the right combinations, and, third, proper proportioning so as to form at each meal a constructive health and energy building whole. All of which is much simpler than it sounds.

And, strange as it may seem, scientifically proportioned meals are more delicious and more satisfying than the meals which are chosen without regard to health. Instead of being deprived of the good things of life, we come to take more pleasure in eating than ever before. It is not even necessary to upset your table to eat scientifically, and no special foods are required. You can get anything you need out of your garden, at your local store or in any restaurant.

Eugene Christian, the well-known food scientist, has shown repeatedly that just as wrong eating causes sickness and loss of brain energy, good foods rightly combined and proportioned will remove the cause of almost any non-organic disease and increase the mental efficiency of users several hundred per cent.

Business men who are "slowing down" and find they have lost their energy and enthusiasm go to Christian to renew their youth. People who suffer with stomach, liver and kidney trouble—most of whom had tried all other sources—come to him and go away brimming with perfect health and energy. Others who are too stout or too thin find that with foods alone and Christian's advice they can quickly acquire a normal figure.

In a number of instances his patients have been so thankful for what he has done that they have, after the treatment was over, in paying the bill, voluntarily added $500 or $1,000 to the amount, saying that never could they adequately repay him for the good he had done.

In order to help as many people as possible, not only those who are ailing but those who want to maintain their health, Eugene Christian founded The Corrective Eating Society to disseminate his teachings. This society has prepared a book based upon Christian's 20 years' experience. Corrective Eating, in 24 Lessons, is being offered for free examination to those who are interested. This work was written expressly for the layman. Technical terms have been avoided and every point is explained so that there can be no possible misunderstanding. Reasons are given for every recommendation, and every statement is based upon actual results secured in the author's many years of practice.

But the lessons do not merely tell you why you should eat correctly and what the results will be, they also give actual menus for breakfast, luncheon and dinner, curative as well as corrective, covering every condition of health and sickness for all ages, from infancy to old age, and covering all occupations, climates and seasons, including special suggestions for summer meals which enable you to withstand the heat and retain winter's vigor.

Food is the fuel of the human system. And just as certain fuels will produce definite results when consumed in a furnace, so will certain foods produce the desired results when put into the human furnace.

Yet not one person in a thousand has any knowledge of food as fuel. Some of the combinations we eat every day are as inefficient and dangerous as soggy wood, wet leaves, mud, sawdust and a little dynamite would be for a furnace. No wonder man is only 50% efficient—no wonder the average life is only 39 years—no wonder diseases of the stomach, liver and kidneys have increased 103% within the past 30 years!

Yet the Corrective Eating Society shows how easy and simple it is to eat your way back to perfect health and up to a new type of physical and mental power. The relationship of health to material success is so close that the result of the society's teaching is a form of personal efficiency which puts people head and shoulders above their less fortunate brothers. Everyone knows that the best ideas, plans and methods are worked out when you are brimful of vitality—when you feel full of "ginger." The better you feel—the better work you can do. I understand that The Corrective Eating Society's lessons have times without number been the means of bringing great material prosperity to its students by endowing them with health so perfect that work seems like play.

If you would like to have the Book of 24 Lessons in Corrective Eating, written by Eugene Christian, out of his vast experience, simply write The Corrective Eating Society, Dept. 348, 460 Fourth Ave., New York City, and they will mail you a set for examination.

It is not necessary to enclose any money with your request. Merely write and ask them to send the lessons for five days' free examination with the understanding that you will either return the lessons within that time or remit $3, the small fee asked.

If the more than 300 pages contained in the course yield but one single suggestion that will bring greater health, you will get many times the cost of the course back in personal benefit—yet hundreds write the society that they find vital helpfulness on every page.

I suggest that you clip out and mail the following form instead of writing a letter, as this is a copy of the official blank adopted by the society and will be honored at once.

Oscar Lowry of Cedar Falls, Iowa, has had the satisfaction of seeing a number of cities vote dry at elections, which followed shortly after the tabernacle campaigns. This year's work included Shenandoah, Ia.; York, Neb.; Cedar Falls, Iowa (his home town); Clarinda, Iowa, all small cities, and the conversions totaled over 3,000.

The Forsythe Evangelistic party hold union tabernacle meetings in the following cities: Kirksville and Cape Girardeau, Mo., Denison and Burlington, Ia., and two campaigns in the city of Detroit. As a result of the season's work about 9,000 persons have made public profession of their acceptance of Christ.

Elmer C. Miller of South Bend, Ind., who before taking up evangelistic work was the Lumber Purchasing Agent for the Studebaker Corporation, has held union campaigns since last fall in Sunbury, Pa.; Casey, Ill.; Paxton, Ill.; Wheaton, Ill.; and East Palestine, Ohio. The end of the campaign in East Palestine saw about 1,300 trail-hitters; among them were the mayor and the editor of the daily paper. Earlier in the year Mr. Miller held campaigns in Mechanicsburg, Pa., and Boyne City, Mich. There were over 2,500 confessions in the two campaigns. In Mechanicsburg a men's Bible class of 500 members was established. Mr. Miller begins the fall work in September at Oswego, N. Y.

Robert E. Johnson's work in Pennsylvania, together with the Red Bank, N. J., campaign, has attracted wide attention, especially among the wet and dry factions. Following a campaign in Brookville, Pa., in which there were 1,920 converts, four breweries, four wholesale liquor places and thirty-eight saloons went out of business. Other Johnson campaigns were held at Mount Union, Pa., Lehighton, Pa., Osceola Mills, Pa., and Red Bank, N. J., with over 13,000 decisions.

Earnest G. Crabill, who is also known as a baseball evangelist, closed his season's work at Binghamton, N. Y., following meetings at Carbondale, Pa., and West Scranton, Pa. The converts in the three meetings numbered 2,500, with many reconsecrations. Mr. Crabill begins the new season in a union campaign at Victor, Colo., in the Cripple Creek district, July 16.

California, long called the graveyard of evangelists, has been the scene of an entire season's work for the Fife Brothers, with Clyde Lee Fife as evangelist. The figures of converts, 3,335, include reconsecrations, b no more than 10 per cent. of the signer ver already identified with the chu he Meetings were held in Eureka, ver side, Long Beach, South Pas na Woodland, Pomona and Lodi. The Correspondence of Prof. David Smith, D.D.

YOU make it clear that a sinner, if penitent, is certain of forgiveness. I feel, however, that there is difficulty in deciding for oneself whether one is truly penitent. Is it possible, therefore, for any man to say with certainty that his sins are forgiven? How far is faith a matter of the will, a duty and responsibility? How far is it a gift of God? If everything depends on faith, the faith of a little child, and all that I am at times able to bring is the faith that wills to trust, with none of the simplicity and trustfulness of a child's faith, is such faith of none avail?—A. G. R.

YOU are vexing yourselves about the quality of your faith and the reality of your penitence. Look at the penitence and faith of the Prodigal. They were at the outset the merest rudiments. So long as his money lasted, he had never a qualm. It was only when it was all gone, and he was brought to rags and hunger, that his thoughts turned homeward. And even then it was not his sin that troubled him, but the misery of his condition. He felt no shame for the ill part he had played, no compunction for the grief he had cost his father. He did not yearn for his father's forgiveness, but merely for the bread of his father's house. "How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish here with hunger! I will arise and go to my father." His penitence was as selfish as his sin. Yet it availed. His father received him with an overflowing welcome, and never inquired what had brought him. It was enough that he had returned. And this is God's way. "All the fitness he requireth is to feel your need of him." He will receive us, and the experience of his grace w teac us true penitence. It was his ther welcome that humbled the digal He never truly repented until h as i his father's arms, and then he r ente in good earnest.

It is not our penitence that cur our forgiveness. It only rema tha we should appropriate it. The or our Father's house stands op , an there is a free, glad welcome f ever returning sinner. This is expres l by touch which is, to my mind, t fine in the parable, though it is qui obli erated in both our versions. W n t prodigal began his premeditated onfe sion, his father would not hear n ou He shouted to the servants: Bri forth (not "the best robe," but a ro —the first," or rather "the fo er" that is, the one he used to wea befo he left home. And the servar kn well what he meant. He had pt lost son's garment, a sacred m ment and many a time they had seen m u folding it and looking at it w h d eyes. God is our heavenly Fat r, a his heart is yearning evermore or lost children.

The reason of all our disqu ude that we will not take our tho hts God from the Lord Jesus Ch t, a recognize in the eternal Son the anife tation of the eternal Father. it true that the love which died f de of us on the cross enfolds the iver then what is there in life or ath eternity that we need to fret ab t or afraid of?

International Sunday School Lesson for August 20.
Acts 19:23-41

An Exciting Day in Ephesus

By Arthur H. Howland

SOME modern people object to religious enthusiasm. They do not like to hear people shout when they feel spiritually happy. They do not like them to be noisy in ascribing praise to the Deity. They do not like to have them too demonstrative in seeking to spread the emotions of loyalty and reverence toward God. Such people would have been greatly scandalized if they had been in the city of Ephesus many years ago when in a great outburst of religious enthusiasm a huge multitude shouted for two hours: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians."

Yet it would certainly seem reasonable to expect that if people could be so tremendously enthusiastic about a god who had no reality, who had no power to bless and protect, to cheer and comfort them, others might be excused if they become so extravagantly happy in contemplating the splendors and the kindness of the true God and in acknowledging the riches of his abundant blessings as to shout aloud his praise.

This outburst at Ephesus came near the close of a busy and exciting day. If there had been daily papers in Ephesus at that time it would have been a rare day for reporters on the evening papers.

In fact, it might not be a bad idea for some teacher of a young men's class to suggest that the members prepare an issue of the "Ephesian Evening Star," giving an account of the riot and its dispersal by the town clerk, together with editorial comment on the occurrences of the day and the events that had led up to them. If the work were done reverently and sympathetically the exercise might be very helpful.

Three lessons have intervened since our last study of Luke's narrative in the Acts. The last study took us through the eighteenth chapter and showed us the beginning of Paul's third missionary journey, verse 23. We also had the incident of Apollos, the young Jewish Alexandrian convert, who was led into the Pentecostal blessing by Aquila and Priscilla. They had come from Corinth to Ephesus with their friend Paul and continued their residence there when he went on to Antioch.

The nineteenth chapter, which is our lesson today, tells us of Paul's return to Ephesus. Strange to say, he found a group of believers there who, like Apollos, had not yet heard of or received the Holy Spirit. It is a rather difficult question why Aquila and Priscilla had not met with these believers and instructed them as they had Apollos. It may possibly be that in the great city of Ephesus they had not yet met this little band of Jews who had heard of John the Baptist and of his announcement of the Messiah and were following what light they had received. It seems more likely, though, that Aquila and Priscilla had been absent from the city in the meantime, and so failed to discover these twelve "half-Christians." Paul found them and perceived that they were ready to become genuine Christians, whole-hearted Christians, Spirit-filled Christians. Under his teaching they too received the Pentecostal gift of the Holy Ghost.

There are countless churches where a visit from some Spirit-filled apostle like Paul is sorely needed. Dean Howson, commenting on this passage in Schaff's Commentary, says: "The most natural explanation is that Paul noticed in them, as they attended the meetings at the church, a want of spiritual gifts, perhaps also a want of the peace and joy and brightness that showed itself in others." Would Paul find some people like that if he came into your church prayer meeting some night? Would he notice anything like that about you, yourself, as he observed your work and listened to your words? It is sad indeed that so many Christians choose to live an experience such as Christ's followers knew before Pentecost rather than reveling in the delights, and appropriating the powers of the Pentecostal blessing.

Teachers of adult classes, superintendents and pastors should take occasion from the study of this chapter to urge an earnest study of the subject of the Holy Spirt and a personal reception of his blessing. Assign for special study some passages or chapters from Torrey's "The Baptism of the Holy Spirit," John McNeil's "The Spirit-Filled Life," William Arthur's "The Tongue of Fire," Finney's "Lectures on Revivals," Daniel Steele's "Gospel of the Comforter," "Love Enthroned," and "Milestone Papers."

For three months Paul taught in the Jewish synagogue; then trouble arose and he transferred his operations to the school of Tyrannus. We do not know just how large a school this was that was kept by Tyrannus, nor how public it was, nor how private. It may either have been a sort of private synagogue for the teaching of Jewish Scriptures and traditions, or Tyrannus may have been a Greek teacher of rhetoric or of philosophy. Paul may have hired this hall, or Tyrannus may have been won to the Christian faith and donated its use, or Paul may have lodged with Tyrannus as he had lodged with Justus at Corinth. In any case his work grew and the message of the Gospel spread. Many not only in Ephesus but in the surrounding provinces heard of this new faith that the Jewish professor was teaching in Tyrannus' school.

The Christian faith became so well known that some strolling Jews who pretended to cast out evil spirits took to using the name of Jesus in their incantations. One maniac whom they attempted to treat in this manner cried out: "Jesus I know, and Paul I know, but who are ye?" Whereupon he attacked the imposters and routed them. This still further extended the reputation and influence of Paul.

So great was the public enthusiasm in his favor that those who had employed the black art brought their books and made a great bonfire of them. The value of the books burned was equivalent in purchasing power to somewhere from $50,000 to $100,000 at the present day. It was a big popular demonstration in Paul's favor, showing the strong hold he had gotten upon the city.

Here enters a mysterious but most real factor, which sociological experts term "economic determinism." This is the principle that all sociological developments and changes are brought about fundamentally by economic necessity. The moralist and Christian can hardly accept the universality of this principle, but religious history shows many instances of its power. You can trifle with institutions, forms and customs up to a certain point, but when you run foul of the power of money there is bound to be a conflict. This is the very thing that Jesus had in mind when he said: "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon."

The beginning of Paul's real trouble came when he offended the book publishers of the magicians. Then the silversmiths began to realize what his philosophy would do to their business if it was not held within bounds. There is not time nor space to go here into the splendors of the Diana worship of Ephesus. Her great temple there was one of the seven wonders of the world. The whole city paid her homage and the making of silver idols and little shrines for her was a big business. If possible look up the description of this Diana worship on pages 465-468 in Conybeare and Howson's "Life and Epistles of Paul." Demetrius, leader of the revolt, was very frank about it. "Sirs," he said, "ye know that by this craft we have our wealth." Paul had been doubtless very discreet in Ephesus as he had been in Athens in trying to turn the religious instincts of the people away from Diana toward Jehovah, but the crisis had at last been reached. The idolmakers saw that Paul must be downed

Sweet as the Rose are clothes when washed with Fels-Naptha Soap

You will just love to duck your head into a basket of clothes that are washed with Fels-Naptha. The clothes smell clean because they are clean—not only on the surface, but clean through and through. And you don't have to boil them to get them that way. All you need to do is to follow the very simple and easy directions on the red and green wrapper.

Never mind how they did the washing and cleaning before Fels-Naptha was invented. When you once learn how reliably Fels-Naptha will do things for you, you'll be just as enthusiastic as every Fels-Naptha user is today.

WHEN A MAN'S A MAN

By Harold Bell Wright

Illustrated by the Author Cloth 12mo $1.35

WHEN A MAN'S A MAN is a fine, big, wholesome novel of simple sweetness and virile strength. While the pages are crowded with the thrilling incidents that belong to the adventurous life of the unfenced land depicted, one feels, always, beneath the surface of the stirring scenes the great, primitive and enduring life forces that the men and women of this story portray. In the Dean, Philip Acton, Patches, Little Billy, Curly Elson, Kitty Reid and Helen Manning the author has created real living, breathing men and women, and we are made to feel and understand that there come to everyone those times when in spite of all, above all and at any cost, a man must be a man.

or their trade was doomed. So they linked up their religious pretenses with their economic necessities and started the cry, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" The cry caught and swept the multitude. Those who had no interest in the idol business felt a tremendous enthusiasm for Diana, so they joined in the cry until "the whole city was filled with confusion." For some reason they did not at first get hold of Paul, but they did capture two of his companions, Gaius and Aristarchus, and rushed them into the theater—a great amphitheater like the Coliseum of Rome. The ruins of this ancient theater into which Gaius and Aristarchus were hustled on this eventful day may still be seen. Then Paul appeared and tried to make his way into the theater. His friends prevented this and some municipal officials known as "asiarchs" urged him not to go in. The confusion outside was carried within, and many people did not know what the uproar was all about. Then somebody put forward a Jew named Alexander. He started to explain the situation to the people, and although he would have taken sides against Paul, when the native Ephesians noticed that he was a Jew they would not listen to him, but raised the frenzied cry again: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!"

Here comes upon the scene one of the pleasantest people in all the New Testament. He is called the town clerk, evidently in Ephesus an officer of high authority. The Youth of Jesus

Epworth League. Matt. 1:21; Luke 2:40; 2:52.

It is sometimes a little difficult not to be impatient with our reference fixers for the decisions they make, particularly in the matter of leaving out the beginning or the end of a passage they assign for our study. Any study of the youth of Jesus ought to have that lovely 39th verse of the second chapter of Luke. "They returned into Galilee, to their own city, Nazareth."

That makes Jesus seem very real. Nazareth is a city you can go to now. It is as real as Binghamton or Peoria. And Jesus really lived there, just as you live in the town where your own home is.

Read this paragraph from the 1912 Baedeker, and see how matter-of-fact Nazareth is. It was hardly so gay in his time, and probably not so large, though it was near an important caravan route.

"The appearance of the little town, especially in spring, when its dazzling white walls are embosomed in the green of cactus-hedges, fig-trees, and olive-trees, is very charming. The rapidly increasing population amounts to about 15,000, including 5,000 Moslems, 5,000 Orthodox Greeks, 1,000 United Greeks, 2,000 Latins, 200 Maronites, and 250 Protestants. The town enjoys a certain measure of prosperity; most of the inhabitants are engaged in farming, gardening or cattle-raising, some of them in handicrafts (particularly in the manufacture of knives, sickles, plowshares, and so on), and in the cotton and grain trade. The inhabitants are noted for their turbulent disposition. The Christian farmers have retained many peculiarities of costume. At festivals the women, many of whom are beautiful, wear gay, embroidered jackets, and have their foreheads and breasts laden with coins, while the riding-camel, which forms an indispensable feature in such a procession, is smartly caparisoned with shawls and strings of coins."

It was in this Nazareth that Jesus "grew and waxed strong in spirit, becoming full of wisdom" (see marginal reading of American Revision). And it was here the "grace of God was upon him," here he "increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man."

At Nazareth Jesus learned how to be a good son, a good playmate, a good student and faithful worshiper in the synagogue, a good neighbor, a good carpenter. He grew strong in body and mind and soul. He realized God's presence and heard God's wondrous call.

We know, too, that as a boy witnessed many of the horrible cr of the Roman government and its zation. This helped to give him h sionate sympathy with the co people and his determination to them. See especially his first s when he came back to Nazareth.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

L Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in da prayer at the noon hour. Also any on is at liberty to send a request for prer or an acknowledgment of answered prer, thereby becoming enrolled as a mber of the Prayer League. All co spondents are specially requested to me their letters as brief as possible. We requests and acknowledgments on erate sheets.

SPECIAL prayers are asked for a dear friend of the Christian Herald Family, who is sick in the hospital. Hi name is a household word throughou America, but he does not wish the fac of his illness to be made public ju at this time. Pray that he may be sp d to his friends and to the important an work he has to do for the kingdom of od.

is frank, earnest letter comes from A isconsin Friend. We know that the me bers of the League will give the rec st it contains a special place in the prayers:

am a good business man but my life has bee wrecked by drink as is also true of my pu. I want to stop the use of liquor. Will you indly pray for me that I may first overcor the habit, and second that I may regain my rmer good health and prosper financially, as am beyond the age limit, and have lost thr gh drink about everything I ever owned, as ll as friends."

M. writes from London, England: "I s with a full heart of gratitude that I v te to say that I have received very sig l answers to prayer. A relative in Anrica, whom I have never seen, off d my mother and me a home with hei A friend of hers who lives here, is try g to find work for me, and is helping us many ways. I am deeply grateful to d and the Prayer League for these bleings. I would further ask the Leue for us to be plainly guided as to ac ting or not the offer of the home for y mother and me. There are so ma things to be considered."

A wife writes: "Six months ago I wrote you asking prayers that my husband might be led to give up another and that our home might be made happy. That prayer has been answered. Now I ask prayers that he may give up liquor and be fully converted, also three other friends. Please pray for a friend and wife to be reunited in love and happiness for their children's sake."

Mrs. A. G. J., writes from Dinuba, Cal.: "I have been a silent member of the Prayer League for a long time and know God has answered my prayers. But our hearts are very heavy at present. My dear husband had a cataract removed five weeks ago and is still in the hospital. The doctors have little hope that he will recover his sight. Both eyes are very bad and his health is failing. He is only fifty-two years old and has lived a Christian life for thirty years. Was an elder in the Presbyterian Church at Stuart, Neb., for over twenty years. We do all ask your most earnest prayers with us for his recovery."

A Mother writes from Wilkes-Barre, Pa.: "I wrote some time ago asking prayers that I might hear from my boy. I heard very soon after and he is still writing home. I need your prayers still that I may be willing to trust in God and do right."

An old subscriber writes from Evansville, Ind.: "I want to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayer for a revival in our church. It was a great success. Many were converted and renewed in spirt, and I am very grateful to our dear heavenly Father. Please pray for my mother that she may be spared."

Coal Bills Cut ½ to ⅔—Guaranteed with the Underfeed

With one of the severest winters experienced in this section, I kept our house 72 to 75 degrees throughout the season commencing October 10, and my coal bill will not exceed $40 heating twelve rooms —house exposed on all sides. This being the fourth season what better recommendation would one want?
Yours for the UNDERFEED.
(Signed) Henry Beuret
446 E. Dewald St. Ft. Wayne, Ind.

If you are going to burn coal this winter, by all means read carefully the letter shown to the left. Then get this great fact: you can have your coal bills cut ½ to ⅔—GUARANTEED with the UNDERFEED.

On top of that great saving, we further guarantee that your house will be kept warm and cozy all winter long—that you will have an easier time 'tending furnace —and that you will have more healthful heat.

The UNDERFEED saves you money by keeping it in your pocket. Burns the cheaper grades of coal as effectively as others burn the costlier grades.

Every atom of heat is utilized. Coal is fed from below. The hot clean fire on top is always against the effective radiating surfaces. Fire is never smothered by having new coal "dumped" on—never chilled by the opening of top-feed doors.

And a boy can run it. No stooping. No hard work. Ashes fine, clean and white, and need emptying at the most but twice a week.

An Announcement of Hudson Policy

35,000 More Hudson Super-Sixes

Detroit, Mich., July 1, 1916.

We have today to announce—

That more than ten thousand Hudson Super-Sixes have now been delivered to owners.

That we have in four months, by tremendous exertion, quadrupled our daily output.

That we have parts and materials, on hand and in process, for 20,000 more of the present Super-Six. Constantly increasing demand has just forced us to place contracts on materials for an additional 15,000.

Thus it is settled that at least 35,000 more of the Hudson Super-Six will be built like the present model. Our production is now 3,500 monthly.

No Change in Sight

Our opinion is that a like announcement will be made in a year from now. The Super-Six invention in one bound, increased motor efficiency by 80 per cent. From a small, light Six, which delivered 42 horsepower, it created a 76-horsepower motor. And simply by ending vibration.

Stock Super-Sixes, in a hundred tests, have out-rivaled all other stock-car performance. In speed, in hill-climbing, in quick acceleration and endurance, they have done what was never done before.

No man can doubt that the Super-Six holds the pinnacle place among motors. And there is no higher place in sight.

After eight months of experience, with 10,000 cars, not one important improvement in design suggests itself to our engineering corps.

So the Super-Six will remain as it is. And, because of our patents, it will maintain its supremacy.

Watch the 10,000

Watch the 10,000 Super-Sixes now running, and judge if you want a car like them.

Each owner feels himself master of the road. He knows that in every sort of performance his car has out-matched all rivals.

He knows that he has the smoothest-running motor ever built. The most powerful of its size.

He knows that in ordinary driving he never taxes half its capacity. That means long life and economy.

He knows that his motor has shown boundless endurance—such as never before was shown. And that he can look forward to many years of its perfect present service.

Watch some of those cars. Talk to the men who own them. Then ask yourself if there is any fine car equal to it.

Now 135 Per Day

Thousands of men in the past few months have been forced to take second choice. Most of them, we think, now regret it, and will always regret that they did not wait.

Those times are over. We are now sending out 135 Super-Sixes per day.

Go ask our local dealer.

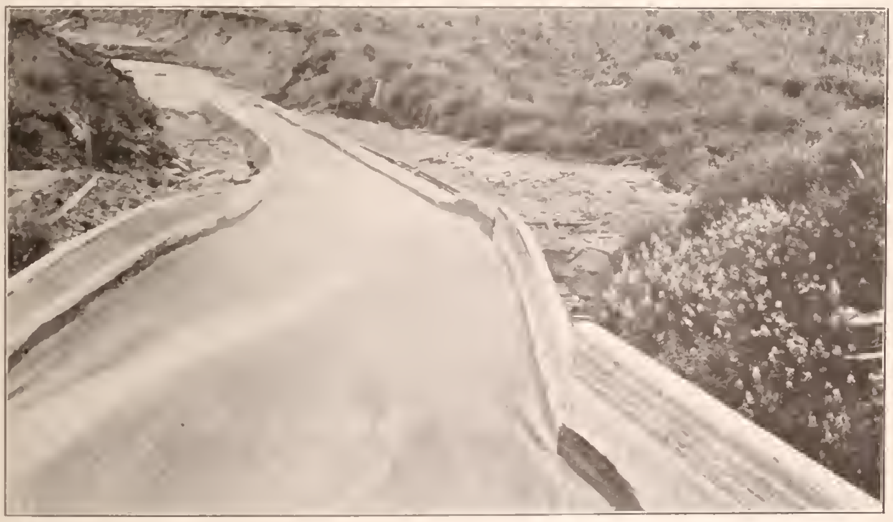
Mining Wonders of Alaska

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

THE wonders of the modern world are to be found on almost every part of the globe, from the diamond mines below the equator in southern Africa to the gold workings in the perpetual ice of the Klondike, under the shadow of the north pole. I have already written something of how the icy strata are thawed by steam points and how the sprinkling of gold scattered through them is saved by the dredges. I have shown you how a great river valley is being lifted up and turned over to a depth equal to the height of a three or four-story house and how from the icy wastes which the individual gold miners have thrown away as worthless is now pouring a stream of gold into the rivers of commerce. This is the work in a nutshell. The story of the work in its details is even more wonderful. I shall mention a few of them in this letter.

First let us look at the great ditch gouged out of the ice-frozen strata by the Yukon Gold Company. When the Guggenheims bought what were supposed to be the exhausted creeks of the Klondike from which the miners had already taken out millions, they found they had to have water to work them and that with a fall so great that it would tear the earth to pieces when it came through the pipes. There was none available excepting in the Tombstone Mountains, seventy-odd miles away. The work of getting it meant the carrying of this river over precipitous peaks, across frozen morasses, through vast ravines, down stupendous valleys, and then lifting it again over mountains and delivering it by a great inverted siphon over the Klondike River to the once famous gold diggings. That is one of the things the Guggenheims did. It took them four years to make the ditch and it cost them millions of dollars. The ditch is now in operation. It consists of about twenty miles of flume, twelve and a half miles of steel and stave pipes, and thirty-eight miles of ditch. It varies at every few miles in its method of construction, according to the nature of the ground which it crosses, but at the end the water is delivered with such force that it can be thrown against the icy hills at a pressure of over 400 pounds to the square inch.



A section of the six-mile artificial stream that warms itself in a temperature below zero

The making of such a ditch in a country like Panama would be easy compared with the work here where Jack Frost is king. Much of the ditch had to be thawed out and cut from the perpetual ice. New methods of road building had to be devised for the swamps, and men and machinery had to be assembled far in the interior of a country which until lately was thought inaccessible to all but the most daring arctic explorers. The supplies from the United States had to come a thousand miles over the ocean, and then be carried five hundred miles more over the mountains and down the Yukon to Dawson. At Panama they could have been landed by ships almost within sight of the works. Here the machinery had to be taken in pieces and dragged by horses and dogs through almost inaccessible wilds.

THE Yukon Gold Company and the Canadian Klondike Company as well have great warehouses filled with everything needed for carrying on their operations. They have a number of each part of every machine that they use, and repairs for electrical equipment, steam equipment, and every possible sort of machine shop and foundry for repairing broken parts upon notice.

It is the same with the supplies of food for their men. They are bought by the ton, and that with a regard for the demands of the miners. One has to understand the working force to know how to order. For instance, the first importation of groceries was based on the demands of the Guggenheim mining camps in California. The United States miners are fond of coffee and this was sent with the supplies by the thousands of pounds. It lay in the store. These Canadian miners would not have it. They drink tea instead of coffee, and have tea for breakfast and dinner and tea for supper as well. Another peculiarity was the flour needed by the baker. In the United States we use the same flour for bread and pastry. The Canadian wants a hard wheat flour for bread and a soft flour for pastry, and the cooks cannot do without them.

The miners and other employees of these big dredging companies are well treated. The lowest wages are $6 a day, or $4 a day and board. There are many men who receive from 70 to 90 cents an hour, and the foremen and superintendents get excellent salaries. There is great competition for the best men, and each company treats its laborers much better than similar organizations in the United States. The labor is scattered over the territory where the different parts of the dredging are done. Each little center has its own camp with bunkhouses as sleeping quarters near by.

EVERYTHING connected with the gold working going on in the Klondike is run just as carefully as a great modern factory. Cost sheets are kept, and the operation of the property is based upon the maximum efficiency of both men and machines. Mr. Boyle's dredges have worked for weeks at more than 97 per cent. of their capacity. They are run throughout the season, which lasts from May until the latter part of November, with a loss of less than 10 per cent. in stoppages of any kind. They never put in less than twenty-two hours out of the twenty-four, and they go on day and night, Sundays and week days, until they are closed by the coldest of the winter months.

And this brings me to another of the new wonders of civil engineering in the far north. It is the invention of Joe Boyle by which he keeps his big hydro-electric plant running throughout the winter, and that notwithstanding the temperature at times falls to 70 degrees below zero. It is so cold here in the winter that if you should attempt to run a spraying machine such as is used in an orchard the water would turn to snow before it fell to the ground. Some of the streams have seven feet of ice over them and many freeze solid. Nevertheless, Mr. Boyle has been able to turn a branch of the Klondike River into a great ditch six miles in length and drop it down upon turbines with a fall that would create electricity to the extent of 10,000 horsepower day in and day out the year through. The amount he is actually using is only 3,000 horsepower, but the equipment is such that it could be easily increased by the adding of units.

There are many electric plants of this kind in the world, but none which is moved by water in such temperatures as freeze the soil and gravel everywhere to seven feet deep, or where the rivers run above strata of perpetual ice. How did Joe Boyle solve the problem? He did it by marrying the common horse sense for which he is noted to his genius for practical invention. He knew that the waters of the Yukon and the Klondike flow under the ice all winter long and that there is a space between the water and the ice overhead.

Mr. Boyle concluded that it was this dead air space that kept the running water from freezing. It was on the principle of the double walls of an ice-house or of the thermos bottle. The only thing necessary was to make nature furnish the bottle. This Joe Boyle does. He fills his ditch to the top and allows nature to freeze a sheet of ice a foot or so thick upon it. He then drops the water for a depth of two feet and has still a running stream of four feet or more farther down. The dead air space above keeps off most of the frost, and in order to add to the heat he installs electric heaters in the bed of the stream, which aid in keeping the water from freezing. These heaters each represent units equaling about one hundred horsepower. There are comparatively few of them in the six miles of ditch. They do not raise the temperature of the water, but they aid in holding it just where it is. It is the same water falling that furnishes the electricity. Indeed, the water warms itself. It makes me think of a man standing out in the open and violently swinging his arms to keep himself warm.

I went out yesterday in an automobile with Mr. Boyle to North Fork, thirty miles up the Klondike Valley to where this electric plant is situated. The ditch is thirty feet wide, about six feet in depth and six miles in length. The water flows through the ditch and drops down through great pipes, with a fall of 220 feet on the turbines, and it keeps the latter moving all the year through. As we looked at the ditch, I asked Mr. Boyle how he got the idea of electrically heating the ditch. He replied:

"The idea came to me one morning at breakfast. We had toast and eggs, and were browning the bread on an electric toaster. As I looked at it I thought that we might employ the same principle in keeping the water from freezing. I then got my men to take a lot of telephone wire and make a gigantic toaster something like a woven-wire bed spring. We had this properly insulated, and dropped it into the ditch. It was connected with the electric plant and the problem was solved."

My Enemy
My Corn

It's Utterly Needless

This is to prove that every corn which stays and hurts is folly.

Lovers of dainty footwear are bound to start corns. But nobody needs to keep them.

At the first sign—or anytime—apply a Blue-jay plaster. That ends all pain. And it ends the corn. In two days it disappears.

You know that paring never cures. You know that harsh applications are wrong.

Now you should know Blue-jay. It has ended 70 million corns. To a world of men and women it has brought perpetual freedom.

We promise that to you.

Just David

By ELEANOR H. PORTER, Author of "Pollyanna"

Just David
By Eleanor H. Porter

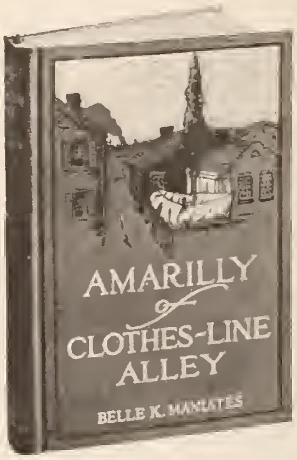
EVERYONE who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm.

David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend.

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

By BELLE K. MANIATES



WE have had so many inquiries for "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley" in book form that it gives us much pleasure to announce the sale of a special edition of this splendid story. No one can forget the charm of Amarilly. Amarilly was a child of the slums, the oldest of a family of eight, all wage-earners, except the baby. How prosperity in the end came to the Jenkins Family, how Amarilly got an education, how the Boarder married Lily Rose and built an annex and the adventures of the surplice are told in a wholesome story. There is a human appeal, sweet humor, and genuine cheeriness between its covers.

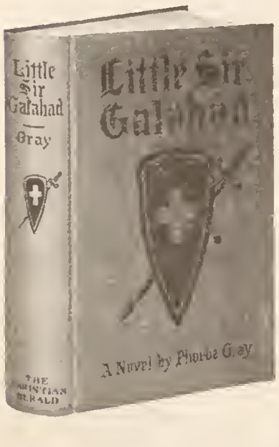
Little Sir Galahad

By PHOEBE GRAY

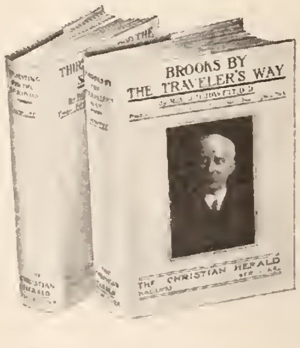


WE do not know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story that it appeals to the reader probably with greater force than if the action were on a more dignified level.

"Little Sir Galahad" is really a story of the golden age in our own time — that beautiful season that makes life radiant while it lasts.

It is as good a story as we have encountered in many a day, and that's saying a good deal.

Two Books by Dr. Jowett



REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D., has been aptly described as the most spiritual preacher in America. He has written two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way." These delightful books are written in this great preacher's happiest vein and the gift of felicitous expression shines out on every page.

Dr. Jowett is a deep student of human nature. He has a faculty of kindling the finer emotions and awakening the noblest ambition. This was the impression on the minds of the editors of the Christian Herald after reading these two companion volumes. The books will be welcomed by thousands who will be glad of the inspiration they afford.

(Both volumes sent for one new eight months' subscription.)

Questions and Answers

B. J. M., Milford, Del. Will you give some light on the resurrection of those who have died, and are Christians? I have always from childhood thought that our soul goes immediately to be with Jesus, and it is such a comforting thought; but of late I have heard some disquieting talk. I have lost a loved one only a short time ago, and it has troubled me to think I do not have that satisfied feeling as I did, that my dear one is now happy in heaven (she was a Christian), but must wait until the last day.

You will find the whole subject of the resurrection fully dealt with in I Cor. 15. A great deal has been written about it since then, but that chapter remains the basic presentation of Christian belief on the subject. As to the further question, whether a redeemed soul goes to heaven immediately after death, there has been much discussion. There are several passages which sustain such an inference, including Luke 23 : 43; Luke 16 : 19-31; Phil. 1 : 23. That the righteous, whom the world calls dead, still live, Jesus himself attested in Matt. 22 : 31; Mark 12 : 26; Luke 20 : 37, 38; and in Gen. 5 : 24 there is the same declaration, also in Heb. 12 : 1. For a still more personal and authoritative assurance we turn to the Saviour's language in John 14. In considering spiritual conditions beyond this life, we should not regard them as subject to the time and place limitations of the earth-life. In God's presence a thousand years are as one day. But in order to bring such subjects within human comprehension, they are stated in Scripture in human terms or forms of speech. To talk of the sleep of death as being age-long is to use mere material terms. To the ransomed and glorified spirit, the transition from physical death to eternal life, some commentators have held, cannot he measured in the terms of time, but rather as if, falling asleep on earth, they awoke in heaven. On such points, however, no one has the right to dogmatize. They can only be grasped by the spiritual understanding, as we progress in the new life and as the fuller revelation comes to us in God's good time.

Reader, Rockville, Ill. Marriage laws differ in the various states. You should ascertain through a reliable source how the question at issue is governed by the laws of your own state.

Reader, Deer Park, Wash. The passage referred to in your letter is to be found in I Sam. 19 : 12-17. During the times of Samuel, Saul and David, the worship of God seems to have been kept remarkably free from heathen contact, although there are expressions in the Scripture record which show that traces of idolatry still lingered in the land. Thus we find in the home of Michal, Saul's daughter and David's wife, the presence of teraphim, which are believed to have been household images or talismans, some resembling the human form in size and appearance, and others much smaller. The "strange gods" which Jacob buried at Shechem (Gen. 35 : 2-4), the images used by Rachel, and that referred to in the incident in I Sam. 19, all go to show that, despite the rigid prohibition laid down in the Mosaic law, the worship of "other gods" than Jehovah was not extinct. In the time of Solomon it had a recrudescence, and reached its height in the reign of Ahab. There is nothing to show that David personally ever bowed knee to an idol.

J. R. S., Philadelphia. "Whosoever will" is the open Gospel invitation, and you may rest assured that it means what it says. Man's antecedents do not stand as a bar between him and God's redeeming grace, if he comes in the true spirit of repentance and takes Christ as his Saviour. The divine mercy is boundless. It is not God who condemns, but our sins, unrepented of and consequently unforgiven. Further, whoever may have been our ancestors, and whatever their faults, they should not be regarded as a hindrance. The case you mention was adjudged unworthy under the Mosaic law, but the law of grace, which Christ gave to the world, satisfied in his own person the ancient law. He was Messiah and Redeemer not for the Jews alone, but for the whole world.

E. T. S., Dixon, Mo.; N. H. G., Branford, Fla.; Mrs. F. I. T., Oakland, Md. Holiness and sanctification are common Scriptural terms, and from time to time throughout the Christian era sects have arisen which taught the actual possibility of real holiness in this life. The most prominent of these is the Methodist group, founded upon the teachings of John Wesley, who held very strongly to the position that the commands to holiness were expected to be obeyed not only in the next life but in this. The great Methodist denomination still teaches in its standard books of doctrine this Wesleyan doctrine of sanctification, as do also the Salvation Army, the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene, and other bodies. The doctrine of holiness has no essential connection with the teaching of the gift of tongues, or with abnormal manifestations of any sort.

Orthodox, Iowa. Do you advocate contests in Sunday school attendance or work or in connection with other departments of the church? It seems to me unscriptural. I know of several cases where it has caused much trouble and strife. I sometimes hear young people say they would not go to Sunday school a certain day if it were not that their class is in the contest. They are losing their appreciation of sacred things and spiritual teachings.

You will notice in the Sunday school lesson for August 13 that Paul made use of almost precisely these methods in taking the collection for the poor Jewish Christians at Jerusalem. In the 8th and 9th chapters of II Corinthians he tells the Corinthian Christians how well the Macedonian Christians are doing with their gifts and says that a year before he had been boasting to the Macedonians of the liberality of the Corinthians. "Your zeal," he tells the people of Corinth, "hath provoked [that is, stimulated] very many." In Rom. 10 and 11 Paul uses the remarkable argument that jealousy of the Gentiles who are finding salvation will lead the Jews to accept it. Note especially Rom. 10 : 19. So he boasts of the importance of the work for the Gentiles, to which he has been called, and explains, "If by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh" (11 : 14). The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews urges, "Let us consider one another to provoke unto love and good works" (10 : 24). You grant that this method really does induce young people to come who would not otherwise. That is certainly a good thing. Now it is up to the teacher, superintendent and pastor to lead them to spiritual life and truth. But it is possible to spiritualize these contests themselves: the young people can be made to feel that they are honoring and pleasing their Master by coming and by working, and the winning of the honor is only a sign that they have been faithful, energetic, efficient in his work. When this machinery is made to take the place of spirituality and love it is harmful; if it can be attached to these it is helpful.

M. E. D., Eldorado Springs, Mo. (an enthusiastic lover of children), sends some very emphatic views on the war. His letter says: "I wonder if we are saving our little boys to be shot on the battlefield? It is a hard question, that hurts, but I wonder? Talk about race suicide—you who rob unborn generations of their fathers, taking the pick of our young men and sending them to certain death on the battle-field; and you, who prepare such instruments of death, are murderers just as surely as if you had pulled the trigger pointed at your brother. There is no sense or reason in nations settling disputes by murder. It is like the duel of olden times, and belongs to the ages before Christ came to save the world. He said Satan was a murderer. Are not our warlike nations of Satan rather than of Christ? Are we not as uncivilized as either China or Japan, seeing we serve him with our lips while our hearts and lives are far from him? We are fast losing our ideals. 'The nation without a vision must perish.' Two years ago we were waving the banner of peace to the world; today—I am ashamed of our attitude."

Subscriber's Son, Cedar County, Ia. In looking through the Subject Index in my Bible I notice "Affliction—from Satan," and "Affliction—from God." How can we tell whether an affliction comes from Satan or from God? If from God, should we ask to be delivered?

Jesus said, "In the world ye shall have tribulation" (John 16 : 33). That is the kind of a world we are living in. It is a world where things are going wrong and where we must expect opposition and trouble. He said again, "It must needs be that offenses come" (Matt. 18 : 7). It really does not make much difference whether the affliction comes direct from God or whether he allows Satan to send it. Paul called his affliction a "messenger of Satan," but God took the matter in hand and made a blessing of it. So Jesus said in the same breath with which he stated that his followers should have tribulation, "Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." It is always right to pray for deliverance from our affliction, but we must always be willing that God should have his perfect way and, if he chooses, bless us in the affliction rather than take us out of it. The first verses of James' l stle give excellent directions about the best method of meeting trouble.

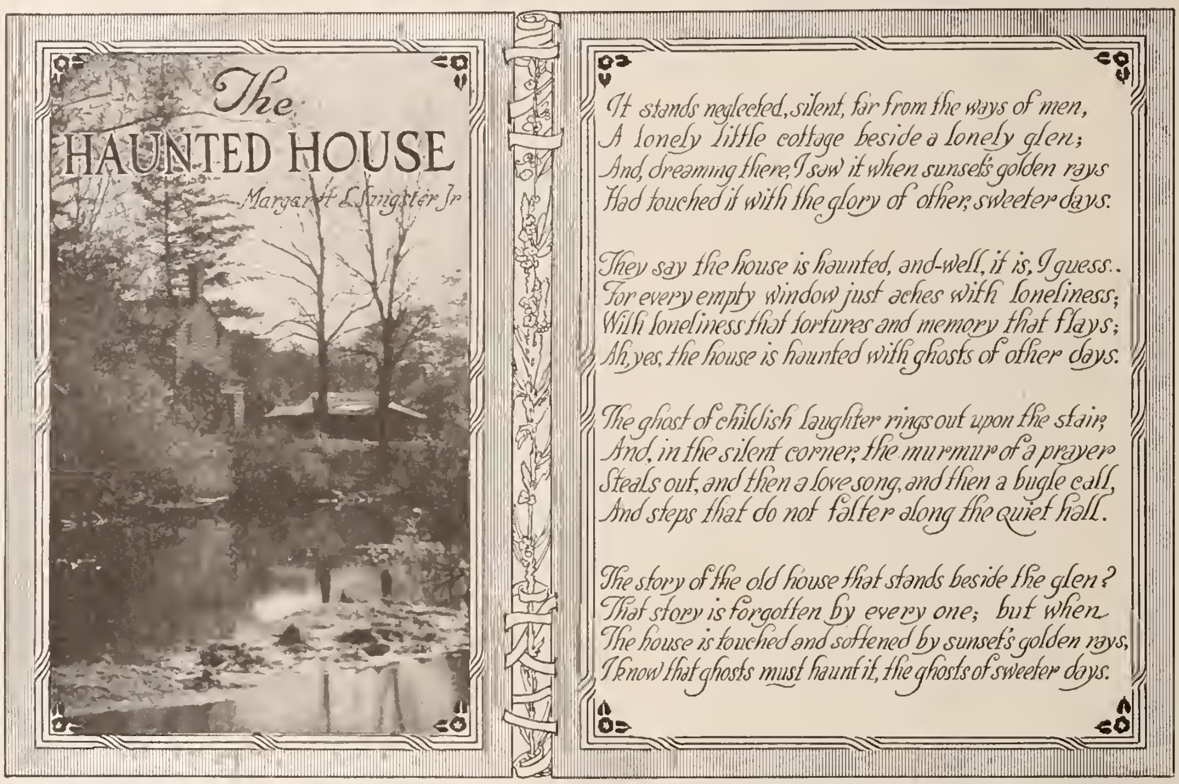
Under the Jewi law, tithing was regulate y a fixed code, while der Christianity, the law ove. as it stimulates the g rous heart, has been subst ted. We are to give accor g as God has "prosper us," always remembering that "the liberal soul shall be made fat," ar that a blessing comes to the cheerful give We should be careful not to multiply our e nditures until little or nothing is left for hi ork. This may involve self-denial, hut we ould remember how largely God is our c tor and that we are indebted to him for the blessings we enjoy. For one who is i ebt the tithing problem is a difficult one. Certainly God does not want us to defra our creditors and give money to his work w h in extreme and urgent cases may be nee for pressing debts. Such a gift would he "without blemish," as we would be di sing of what is not ours to give. But the or ary current obligations of business, which due course adjust themselves, need not be ded as an excuse for stopping gifts to r ious work. There are spiritual as well as m rial needs, and God is a creditor in respect his work who assuredly should not be for ten while earthly creditors are preferred.

Reader, Wilmerding, Pa. I have notic hat at a church service, or other servic hen the leader asks the audience to rep the Lord's Prayer and comes to the p e in Matt. 6 : 12 where "debts" and ebtors" are mentioned, there is always ha or a stoppage to know if the lead says "debts" or "trespasses." This sho not be, as the words plainly say debts h in the Authorized and Revised. The od prayer is spoken to God, and we a him to forgive us our debts, a debt t w cannot pay, and which can only forgiven. We cannot trespass agains od, but we can against our fellow ma and our fellow man can forgive us a no harm done; but if we get in debt, are expected to pay if we are honest. nce. in prayer to God I submit the word bt" should be used; in dealing with an, "trespass" would be appropriate.

It is generally conceded that "trespa " is simply a variant in the Lord's Pray and that "debts" is the older and more ac rate form.



It stands neglected, silent, far from the ways of men,
A lonely little cottage beside a lonely glen;
And, dreaming there, I saw it when sunset's golden rays
Had touched it with the glory of other, sweeter days.

They say the house is haunted, and-well, it is, I guess..
For every empty window just aches with loneliness;
With loneliness that tortures and memory that flays;
Ah, yes, the house is haunted with ghosts of other days.

The ghost of childish laughter rings out upon the stair,
And, in the silent corner, the murmur of a prayer
Steals out, and then a love song, and then a bugle call,
And steps that do not falter along the quiet hall.

The story of the old house that stands beside the glen?
That story is forgotten by every one; but when
The house is touched and softened by sunset's golden rays,
I know that ghosts must haunt it, the ghosts of sweeter days.

Upper New York Bay Bombarded

WHEN parents let a boy point an "empty" pistol at his little sister, pull the trigger and shoot her dead, it is called an act of criminal carelessness. When big manufacturers st vast quantities of munitions of war that can go f in a railway terminal alongside a city, and the go s explode, causing five states to tremble, killing ma persons and wrecking millions of dollars of pr erty, it is called an acci nt.

he "accident" occurred ab t 2 o'clock Sunday morning July 30. On Monday, th first question people as d of each other anywhere wi in the radius of thirty mi of New York was, "I you feel the shock last ni ?" Even beyond that ra s, some say upwards of a ndred miles from the sc of the accident, houses we shaken and people were am ed and terrified.

all wonder! A little wa out from the railroad pie on the New Jersey shore jus below Jersey City is a sm l island called Black To Island. It is a receiving station for foreign-bound fre ht. The National Storag ompany's plant is the do nant occupant. Barges tie p at the island's piers for nloading. Lighters ply be een the shore and the isl d, transferring merchandis from the Central Railro of New Jersey and the Le h Valley Railroad. Thi m ing a lighter carrying tw e cars of the Central Ra oad loaded with ammu tion and explosive projec es had tied up at one of e piers of the island for a ger time than Federal reg ations allow, it is cla ed, in order to save $2. owing fees. There were other barges and cars the loaded with shrapnel and cartridges and high ex sives; in all over $5,000,000 worth of such deadly me handise. A fire, origin unknown, started on this lig r with its twelve cars of concentrated death the in the midst of immense quantities of similar tokens of our strict neutrality. So small wonder that folks in five states tumbled out of bed shouting, "An earthquake."

On Black Tom Island stood upwards of 200 cars loaded with various kinds of merchandise, much of it war munitions, and, in the case of a half dozen cars, dynamite. The fire started by the explosion amidst the débris of cars and barges and buildings, leaped straight for those cars of dynamite, and when they reached them a second explosion convinced almost everybody that the end of all things had come. Already the sky was lurid with reflection of the flames; the flames themselves could be seen for miles in every direction. Unthinkable volumes of black smoke rolled upward and became streaked with yellow, and shot through with red, making an appalling spectacle. And the spectacle was being witnessed by thousands almost as soon as it was under way. Battery Park in New York, the bridges across the East River, the shore line of Brooklyn, the heights of Staten Island, the roofs and hills back in New Jersey, were almost instantly packed with sightseers. And there were sightseers much closer at hand, for several hundred men, some of them with their families on the barges, were on duty guarding the property of the storage company and the railroads. Some of these men are missing and some are known to be dead; the exact numbers have not yet been arrived at; but the dead are said to be seven, the injured many more. But that any of them escaped death or serious injuries is marvelous.

They did not escape easily, for they were suddenly in the midst of a veritable battlefield. As the flames reached the barges and cars loaded with explosives, bullets and bursting shells flew in every direction. Shrapnel is not always shipped ready for use, but it appears that there was considerable of such ammunition waiting shipment that was ready to be fired. So, of course—

Fire boats, and fire companies from Jersey City, were soon in the midst of this battle fighting artillery with water. As the flames swept along to additional cars and into the warehouses, they found such fuel as picric acid, gasoline and thousands of tons of sugar to give them added fury. The continuous explosion of shells helped to spread the conflagration. And late risers on Sunday morning from points of vantage saw through lifting clouds of smoke the crumpled ruins, and heard the lessening bombardment which continued at intervals throughout the morning.

The Blessing of the Dew

*A SERMON BY REV. A. H. TUTTLE, D.D.

TEXT—Hosea 14:5. "I will be as the dew unto Israel."

THE dew is one of the most impressive symbols of spiritual things we have in the whole realm of nature. In this respect it is like the starry firmament. What man can look up into the heavens at night without some sense of the divine? He must be a man of coarse sensibility who can meditate upon the mystery of the dew without some quickening of his spiritual sense. Consequently this symbolism is common not only among the Hebrew people but also among the pagans and among us who live in the Christian environment; in all lands and in all ages. Men's interpretations have not always been correct; but in them all we see the ever-present idea of the divine. Underneath many and varied superstitions there lies an essential and permanent truth.

Before naming the Biblical and natural interpretations of the symbol in which "the invisible things of God are clearly seen," I will quote some of these superstitions because within them there flutters somewhat of the true light, even as the fires of the sun flash in some measure in a badly cut diamond.

Some men have soberly taught that the dew is "the tears of God, shed down on a sinful world to wash away its sin." Others have said that "to bathe in the dew will produce and render permanent the rarest beauty of face and form." Men have sprinkled dew upon their persons to protect themselves from attacks of evil spirits. I have read that the medieval alchemists believed that it was one of the ingredients by which to turn all to gold. Through all these errors there runs an unwavering faith which is true: that "the eternal power and Godhead" may be clearly seen in the dew.

Turning from these imaginations, let us gather the divine significance of the symbolism from the Word of God. It will help us to see that in all Nature there are similar correspondences. Happy is he who can come into that fellowship with God in all his works, finding "sermons in stones, books in running brooks, good in everything," God in all.

THE first and principal meaning of the symbol is: God's personal presence. Though invisible, he himself is actually and ever near us, the supply of our life. "I will be as the dew unto Israel." The elements that make the dew are in the atmosphere that enfolds the parched vegetation. The plants breathe it and live in it even before it takes its visible form. I can imagine a thirsty flower whose petals are about to wither crying out, "Oh, come down from the mountain and the cloud, thou sweet dew, and save my beauty." But the dew does not fall from Hermon, nor from the clouds. It is simply the moisture suspended in the air and, under certain conditions, condensing in the refreshing water drops. Even so our richest blessings lie not far away from us in point of space and time, but are with us here and now.

This fact we are slow to learn. We are stirred with big desires and strive with mighty effort to secure from afar what is right in our presence, ours even now if we would only believe it. There is a proverb, "The cow stands in the meadow knee-deep in clover, and looks over the hedge, longing for the common." How many of us stand in bovine stupidity amid vast opportunities, bemoaning our fate! We blame our environment for our inefficiency, forgetful of the fact that men, unlike plants, are made to be masters of their situation, and that if they would only rouse themselves to earnest endeavor they would discover that their so-called disadvantage is really their advantage.

In nature we know it is the outward circumstance that determines the quality of the plant. The palm will not lift its fronds in the Arctic cold. The chestnut tree will not grow in the Adirondack mountains. Wheat will not ripen in the Scottish highlands or on the tundras of Siberia. But man is not so dependent. If he only will, he can be happy, great and good anywhere. It is altogether a matter of inward qualification, choice, desire, energy, faith. If he will only look not afar off, but just here, he will discover that he is encompassed with blessing, "like the dew."

We see the principle illustrated all about us in varied ways. What triumphs an unfaltering will has made over the most unfavorable conditions! Even in matters intellectual it is true. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." Witness the triumph of stuttering Demosthenes with pebbles in his mouth talking to the sea; and blind Huber investigating the mysteries of the beehive; and deaf Beethoven composing the inimitable Sonatas; and Helen Keller, blind, deaf and dumb, charming the world with her origininal thought and amazing us with her speech and song. Never say: "Fate is against me." The Infinite God who has placed you where you are is as the dew unto you.

> "One ship drives east, another drives west,
> While the selfsame breezes blow;
> 'Tis the set of the sails and not the gales
> That bids them where to go."

What I have said of the dew of his presence in our outer life is specially true of our inner life. Spiritual blessings enfold us as the moisture in the atmosphere, even before they become evident in the dew-drops. They are already provided for us in Christ: pardon, the gift of the Holy Ghost, all those virtues that arise out of the indwelling of the Spirit, the fulness of promise, the life eternal, are already ours, de jure, by Christ's act. If we do not realize them de facto, it is because we do not believe that we have them. Hence the force of that peculiar condition which Jesus states in order that we may realize them in experience: "When ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them! The spiritual Canaan is already yours by God's free gift; now make it yours by conquest. The point we are trying to make clear in this feature of the symbolism is that the heavenly treasure does not lie off in some distant Mecca which we can reach only by a long and painful pilgrimage, or at the tomb of the Saviour which we rescue from the Turk in bloody battle. It is here at your door. Remember Lowell's song of the Holy Grail. The knight sought the holy cup afar and long, and by dire suffering, but found it not till he returned home in despair and paused at the gate to draw a cup of water for a poor beggar. The beggar was the glorified Christ; the common cup was the Grail.

A SECOND fact in the symbolism of the dew is: Refreshment after drought and Realized in the night. It is specially forceful in lands like Palestine, where they have the wet and dry seasons. From May to October there are no rains, and a cloud is rarely seen in the sky. Nearly all the streams, which during the winter months are rushing torrents, become dry, and with few exceptions springs cease to flow. The people store the winter rains in pits, and in the summer laboriously draw the water from wells which they have dug. During the long drought, vegetation would perish but for the baptism of dew. When the sun goes down the earth cools, and the hot air pours out the treasure it has gathered from the mountain clouds and the sea. The thirsty plants are saturated as by a copious rain. Even the cattle quench their thirst by licking the grass.

The spiritual application of this phenomenon is obvious. Nor is it surprising that Israel's prophets and psalmists made use of the heavenly similitude to comfort their afflicted nation. There are sure to come periods of drought in the history of every earnest soul: weary days of lassitude in which the mind loses its usual alertness, the will its strength, the heart its enthusiasm. Faith is shaken by painful questionings. The voice of the joy-birds is hushed. Spirits droop like the leaves of the trees in the excessive heat. What we do then is not well done. We are below our true selves, and everything seems to go wrong. On such days, the general loses the battle, the painter's work lacks the glow of genius, the poet's song is leaden, the preacher's utterance is platitudinous.

IT is not easy to find the cause of these depressing conditions. The meteorological laws are too complicated to find in them an explanation of the Palestinian drought. Who is acute enough to trace through multiplied causes his spiritual lassitude? He longs for the bracing atmosphere, but it is not here. He prays for rain, but the clouds do not gather. But whatever the cause may be, the night is sure to come, and the dew.

It is impossible for me to tell why heaven's bl ings come to us more copiously when we are in the da ness of affliction than when in the glare of pros rity. Possibly it is because it is then we feel more enly our need and thus are more receptive. We rea out suppliant hands and cry out of a conscious wa At any rate, it is a fact that the richest character f all time have come into their spiritual wealth t ough pain, as precious gems develop the power o their glory on the wheels of the lapidary. Ab am, Joseph, Moses, the prophets and the apostl the saints and reformers, and all those heave born women who in our homes have shown us the li rom above, came into their lofty being through pa . It was only in the shame and distress of captivi that Israel finally shook off the bonds of idolatry The Captain of our Salvation was made perfect t ough suffering.

Further, these blessings come not in the fury f the flying storm, or the rushing of the swelling flo , but "as the dew"—so gentle as not to waken the sects that sleep amid the leaves and buds, yet so l, so vitalizing, so satisfying, as to fill our whole bei with the confident assurance that it is "the cloud f his presence" that enfolds us.

A THIRD fact in this symbolism is that t dew comes only in calm: never on a stormy, indy night. The plants must have their "still h r" if they would gather "the blessings of the skies. And this is the call of the dew-drops to the church a l the individual in our turbulent, busy age: to tu frequently from the exhaustive activity of life i the quiet place where in the sacred hush men ma commune with God. To your demurrer that "al imes and places are alike with God," we may reply "But not alike with you."

An imperative need of our time is a return the closet. I say "return," for it is evident that tirement into solitude for the purpose of meditati and prayer is not valued in our age and is very con only neglected. It was not always so. Our father nade much of it. It was their daily habit. From t time of Abraham and Isaac, who went out at even e to meditate, down to the time of our Lord, wh pent whole nights in prayer, God's people felt that live close with him they must be often alone. Th apostles continued the practice in the church. t we are living in a period of strong reaction in t particular. The spirit of our age is not devoti but work; and the Christian aim, partaking of thi pirit, is no longer primarily to know God and att n his character, but to multiply schemes of use ness. Not holiness but service is the watchword. The aspiration is not to be, but to do. The ideal Cl stian is not the prophet coming with face aglow fr n the mount of God, but the armored soldier or th orkman with his tools. The factory is taking the ce of the altar. Organization is supplanting insp tion. The voice of prayer is dulled in the rattle of r chinery. The incense of praise is lost in the smok f the furnace.

WHAT we deplore is not the fact that thes nany forms of Christian work exist. They all h their spring in the love of Christ, are helping to m e the burden of life bearable, and even now are ope channels down which the living waters may flow. Wha we dread is the false ideal which this fact is c ting, namely, that the useful rather than the devo man is the typical Christian. It reverses the divin rder, and unless there is a speedy reaction, it will r lt in an utter secularization of piety. We are not ated by good works into Jesus Christ, but "we are ated in Christ Jesus unto good works." They th fruit, not the root, of the divine life.

But we do not despair. The reaction has eady begun. While the earth is shivering in the a ny of war, and our ears are filled with the noise of tr ping armies, the booming of cannon, and the sh ts of maddened men, our hearts are turning to Go We are famishing for the gentle dew, its divine r reshment and life.

When the Israelites of Hosea's turbulent tin ha neglected the altars of their God and lost thei pirituality, and had come into the black night of t uble then God spoke to them, "I will be as the w to Israel." Even so he speaks to us. Let us linge n the quiet of the sanctuary, until we too realize hin n the dew of his "presence."

The Lordly Grace of Giving

SUNDAY, August 20. II Cor. 9 : 7. "God loveth a cheerful giver." God loveth a cheerful giver because cheerful giving is born of love, and therefore it is a Lover loving a lover and re icing in the communion. Giving is the language of loving: indeed, it has no other speech. "God so l d that he gave!" Love finds its very life in giving it lf away. Its only pride in possession is the joy of urrender. If love has all things it yet possesses n hing.

But we must not confine our thought to material th gs when we think of the grace of giving. We m st get back to the fontal giving of which the gift of noney is only a single issue. It is of this primary s ng that James Hinton has a suggestive word: " e must make our thinking, too, a giving, an escape fr n the death of trying to get." That word has s ly a very vital significance. Our real giving is to egin in our thinking, and first of all in our supreme th king, which is in our prayers. Self is to be lost w n we commune with our God, and our empty p e is to be filled by others. We must be cheerful g rs in our intercessions, fellow laborers with God i listributing the holy powers of grace over a needy m titude.

When a man begins to be nobly generous in his p yers, when his highest thinking is a giving and not a tting, he need have no care about his minor forms of beneficence. It will "stream from the hills and d pend to the plains." When our divine communion is heerfully sacrificial the whole of life will be an u onscious sacrifice. That is a great epitaph on G don's monument in St. Paul's, and it powerfully il strates this law of genial and holy sacrifice: "He g e his strength to the weak, his sympathy to the s ering, his substance to the poor, and his heart t God." His great surrender was the offering of l , and it was made in the secret place; and out of th t central giving, as streams from a fountain, there fl ed all manner of radiant beneficence.

he people who have no money to give are yet not d rived of those joys of cheerful beneficence. "Silver a gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee!" A he imparted a capacity which money could never b e bought. The apostle Paul, "having nothing," l ged to visit Rome, "that I may impart unto you s e spiritual gift." In those supreme realms we c all be benefactors, ministers of a treasure more to b lesired than gold, yea, than much fine gold.

"Drawing Near" to God in Prayer

MONDAY, August 21. Gen. 18 : 16-33. "And Abraham drew near and said." It was the a ernoon of one of the greatest days of his life when A aham, having taken leave of his mysterious g sts, remained standing before the Lord, and p sently "drew near and said". . . What a mar- v ous collocation of words! First, he stood before th Lord, and then drew near. There is a difference h e, which those who have fellowship with God can a reciate. We are always standing in the circle of is presence, but there are hours when we are im- p ed to come into a yet closer contact with the J ge of all the earth. The oratory may be the m ntain, the woodland glade, or the sounding sh e; but it becomes holy ground, where the child m ts God face to face, and talks with him of his w s, and pleads for his fellows.

t was prolonged prayer. We cannot climb the el ated pinnacles of prayer in a hasty rush. They d nand patience, toil, prolonged endeavor, ere the l er slopes may be left, and the aspiring soul reach it greatest nearness. It was very humble prayer. I vas persevering. Six times he came back to press h claim, and as each petition was granted, his faith a courage grew. It was absolutely unselfish. His p sion for God's glory burnt into a clear strong fl e, and it was out of that there arose this wondrous i rcession. It is when we become identified with th interests of God that we have supreme power with h , and prevail.

The Price We Must Pay for Soul Peace

TUESDAY, August 22. Ps. 23 : 2. "He leadeth me beside the still waters." We often think of th se days, lying somewhere afar off, when we shall be permitted to spend long days care-free, and, with our earthly house in order, enjoy perfect peace. It is like the Happy Hunting Ground of the painted Indian, that lies on the mysterious other side.

We place the scene of the great pastoral Twenty-third Psalm in some shadowy moment in the future; it is not a description of our every working day. Yet this psalm is written in the present tense for the most part, and the present consciousness of the Shepherd at our side gives the certain hope of his presence in peaceful passage of the coming "valley of shadow."

Do you know here and there a man, who has learned the way of peace in the life of the busy day? His presence is like a soft summer wind that blows upon your face from the bosom of a country lake.

Sooner or later we learn that it is useless to travel abroad to find peace, and that no particular environment is a surety of quiet tranquillity. Peace is not the commodity of the rich man, and the rulers of other men are frequently the possessors of most troubled careers. I know an old farmer in Pennsylvania who has nothing of this world's goods but an acre or two of ground and a faithful horse; but his peace is truly as "calm as a river."

The price of peace is the consciousness of God in the soul. We pay for it with obedience to the divine will. The courage to trust the leadership of the Shepherd, even through ways unknown to us, is the hand by which we grasp it. "He leadeth me beside still waters."

The Glorious Kingship

WEDNESDAY, August 23. Ps. 24 : 1-10. "Who is this King of glory?" This inquiry might have been made by the angel-warders on the battlements of heaven, when Jesus drew near in all the glory of his Ascension. We are justified in using this psalm of that great event, for the apostle applies it thus in Eph. 4. Of old the question challenged the procession that brought the Ark of God into the ancient city of Jerusalem, whose portals seem too low for it to enter. But now it challenges the King of glory, as he comes to the Celestial City, from which he issued forth to become the man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.

He is indeed the King of Glory! The Father hath glorified him with the glory that he had before the foundation of the world. There blend in him the glory of perfected manhood and the glory of deity. At his girdle hang the keys of death and Hades. Beneath his feet are principalities and powers and the rulers of the darkness of the world. All authority is given him in heaven and earth. Hosts of angels accompany and welcome him. At his chariot wheels are dragged the great enemies of man's happiness and holiness. And all this is gained for us. Salvation consists not only in what our Lord did on the cross, but in all that he is doing on the Throne. We are not always to be facing temptation, but to live looking to him, receiving into our hearts his immortal and sinless life, and yielding to him our wills, our affections, and our obedience. Glory to thee, thou King of glory! We also would see and share in all that thy glorious victory has won! Be pleased to enter the citadel of our hearts!

Taking Jesus at His Word

THURSDAY, August 24. Mark 9 : 23. "All things are possible to him that believeth." Has it ever occurred to you that these words were spoken by Jesus to a man whose strength of belief was quite as necessary for the performance of the healing as was the power of the Master? Have you ever taken firm hold of this promise and acted on it, not for a day but for a year?

Some years ago I had a stenographer who came into the office for a few days to do some temporary work, and I noticed that across the front page of her note-book were written the words of the above text. I was interested to hear the meaning to her of these words, for she had already told us that she had a large work in view and could only work in our office a few days.

"Has that text anything to do with your future work?" I asked.

"Yes," said the girl. "Strangely enough, it has all to do with it. I have always wanted to be a court stenographer, not simply for the pay, but because it represented to me success in my chosen work. One day as I was working in a down-town office, a Salvation Army lass threw a leaflet into the office, and as I picked it up, the words, 'If thou canst,' caught my eye, and then I read the rest of the passage. It all flashed over me instantly. 'That is your trouble: you have been trying to get your ambition all alone. You haven't really believed you could reach the goal, because you have lacked confidence in yourself. Why not let God help you? He has said he would if you could believe.'"

We asked the girl what belief meant practically, as she took that promise.

"Why, I just went ahead as though it was a sure thing," said she. "I wrote that text on all my note-books, and I had it framed for my room, and I repeated it hundreds of times each week. Well, tomorrow I am to become a court stenographer. I've been a year and a half learning to really believe. It has paid."

How much do you believe?

Jesus, the Friend of the Poor and Needy

FRIDAY,' August 25. Ps. 72 : 1-20. "For He shall deliver the needy when he crieth." The injustice of Eastern judicial tribunals is proverbial. It is so today; it has always been so. The hand of the Oriental judge has always been susceptible to gold. The poor, the needy, and they who had no helper have always fared badly. James, in his Epistle, does not scruple to say: "Ye have despised the poor. Do not rich men oppress you, and draw you before the judgment-seats?" Therefore the psalmist fastens on this as the distinguishing mark of the King after God's own heart, who is to gather mankind beneath his sway, that he shall judge the poor of the poeple, and save the children of the needy, and break in pieces the oppressor.

The world-wide empire of our King gleams through these verses. The wild Bedouin of the deserts and the sailors on the Western seas, the kings of Sheba in the East and the kings of the isles of the West, all nations, in fact, shall call him blessed, and the whole earth shall be filled with his glory. But on what does his empire rest? Napoleon's empire was founded on force, and it passed. Christ's rests on mercy, gentleness, and truth, therefore it shall last forever. "All nations shall serve him, for he shall deliver the needy when he crieth." Art thou poor and in need? Is thy soul oppressed with deceit and violence? Art thou without a helper? Then be of good cheer! The King is willing to be thy friend! Thou art the kind of subject that he seeks. Let him hear thy case. He will assuredly undertake to plead it in heaven and on earth. Be of good cheer, thou blind beggar, rise, he calleth thee, to give thee sight of himself first, and then of the spiritual realm into which he shall bring thee.

Beauty Revealed Through Suffering

SATURDAY, August 26. Isa. 53 : 3. "He was despised and rejected of men." When our Lord began his ministry, he was not very attractive in his poverty and humble birth. The people considered him only a workman at the carpenter's bench, who had laid aside his toil to become a roving evangelist. No poor, wandering beggar was more lowly than Christ. There were no four walls he could call his own. If he was not invited to tarry with friends, his bed was the mountain-side. Poor men followed him, becoming his disciples.

Another reason why men at first hid their faces from him was that "he was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." The weight of the world's guilt rested upon his heart. The prospect of his tragic departure clouded his future. Humanity delights in cheerfulness, hopefulness and joy; therefore many turned their eyes away from him. When he reached the supreme hour of his sacrifice for all mankind, his own loved disciples forsook him and fled. But after the resurrection, when his followers began to realize that he was the God-Man, by whose stripes they were healed, and whose kingdom was not of this world; when they saw the glorified face now freed from expressions of sorrow, beautiful with divinity, majestic with Godlikeness, then they hung upon his lips and longed for glimpses of his compassionate countenance. They were enamored with his loveliness; lost in his beauty. They saw that the chastisement of their peace was upon him and that the hope of the ages was in him.

CASEMENT PAYS THE ULTIMATE PENALTY. At 9 A.M., August 3, in Pentonville Jail, London, Sir Roger Casement was hanged for treason, proclaiming, "I die for my country." His country was Ireland. His execution was martyrdom. His offense was assistance to the cause of a free and independent Ireland given in a manner pronounced treasonable by the British government. In April last he landed on Irish soil from a German submarine just prior to the armed revolt of Irish volunteers, was arrested charged with high treason, convicted, and, despite a mighty voice of appeal for clemency, including a petition from the United States Senate, was executed, and his body, refused to his relatives, buried in quicklime. The British government undoubtedly acted within its rights. Most everybody else thinks that Sir Roger did also. He has entered the ranks of the martyrs. Ireland has another rallying cry, England another obstacle to Irish concord. Born in County Antrim, in the north of Ireland, September 1, 1864, of Protestant parents, at the age of twenty-eight Casement entered upon a career of great usefulness to the British government in its foreign service. He rose steadily in rank and influence, and, by virtue of his unsparing exposure of the barbarous cruelties practiced by Belgian rubber-hunters in Africa, was knighted in 1911 and received the Coronation Medal. Later he investigated and exposed the still greater atrocities perpetrated by English rubber-hunters in Peru, in both cases his fearless reports producing such public outcry as to result in governmental repression of the practices in the rubber regions of the Congo and Peru. In 1913 Sir Roger retired from the government service and identified himself with the Irish Home Rule movement as a Volunteer. By his activities in behalf of Home Rule, he erased his name from the nation's roll of faithful servants and wrote it among the saviors of humanity.

CHINA DISCOVERS NEW WALL IN WALL STREET. Negotiations long continued to float a big Chinese loan in America have received a setback in the refusal of members of the American International Corporation (banking) to favor the project until China can give absolutely satisfactory security. Both the present and the preceding Administrations at Washington had disapproved of a loan to China by American bankers, but in response to an urgent appeal from the Chinese government this ban had been removed, and the bankers were recommended to assist China as a matter of good policy. The Chinese parliament reconvened August 1 with an attendance of 400 delegates. The new president, Li Yuan Hung, took the oath of office and urged the legislators to reconstructive work. President Li wore European dress. Owing to differences parliament adjourned temporarily.

"WELL SINCE YOU INSIST—." Having taken since early in June to consider the matter former Supreme Justice Charles E. Hughes on July 31 accepted the Republican Party's nomination of himself for President, doubtless to the intense relief of that party. In his speech of acceptance before a great crowd in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Hughes, as is customary with nominees of a party out of power, tore the present Administration to tatters and proved conclusively upon whom the safety of the republic really depends. There is no question that the note of Americanism sounded by Mr. Hughes will strike a responsive chord in—well, possibly a majority of the electorate breasts of the nation. With the published speech as an index to Mr. Hughes' intentions should he become President, Mr. Wilson is preparing to show how utterly mistaken the Republican nominee is on all points. And after that, the country will go to it. (Incidentally, Mr. Hughes has come out absolutely for woman suffrage by constitutional amendment, and Mr. Wilson has reiterated his conviction that that question must be decided by the individual States.)

TWO CENTS UNACCOUNTED FOR. The Women's Clothing Wage Board, operating under the Massachusetts minimum wage law, after exhaustive investigation of living conditions and of operating conditions in the industry, has fixed the minimum wage for experienced female workers of eighteen years and over at $8.75 per week. This wage will be the legal minimum in Massachusetts after February 1, 1917, and an effort is being made to have a similar minimum wage established in New York State. The board fixed this weekly budget as the minimum for self-supporting women living away from home:

Board and room	$5.75
Clothing	1.50
Laundry	.25
Carfare	.10
Doctor and dentist	.25
Church	.10
Vacation	.25
Education	.18
Recreation	.25
Savings	.25
Incidentals	.10
Total	$8.98

Because of conditions in the industry the item of savings was practically eliminated, and the final report fixed the minimum at $8.75.

THIS TIME MAY THEY STICK TO IT. The long strike of the cloakmakers of New York City came to an end the second time on August 3 by a vote of 5 to 1 of the membership. It is so satisfactory to announce a settlement on terms that both workers and employers can accept, that the details may be taken for granted and will not be reviewed here.

RETURN VOYAGE OF THE UNDERSEA TRADER. Although quite a number of warships of the Allies, besides some watchful members of the American fleet, were cheerfully waiting to see the German submarine Deutschland put out to sea, Captain Paul Koenig, whose name has now become known throughout the world, was discourteous enough to ignore their arrangements and make his exit most unostentatiously at 8.35 P. M., August 3, when darkness and a tumbling sea made it impossible for even the faithful tug Timmins and a tenacious press launch to see at just what spot on the safe side of the Virginia Capes the undersea freighter disappeared from view. The Deutschland made the eighteen miles down Chesapeake Bay jauntily enough on the surface, and captain and crew gave this country a hearty cheer in farewell as a token of appreciation of the hospitality shown them. The vessel, which may be the forerunner of an actual u er-sea commerce line, is headed for Bremen, and her daring exploit in-jecting into the somber news of th yar a dramatic and adventurous ele nt which even her enemies must welc ne. The press has reported a rather rge fleet of English and French wa ips of one class and another strung out between this coast and Europe fo he purpose of destroying the Deutsch nd, but while the boat will doubtless ve a difficult time making port, it to be questioned if any great numb of ships have been assigned to the se. The sister submarine to the Deutsch nd, the Bremen, is reported to be du to arrive somewhere on the Atlantic ast any time now with the second und ea cargo of merchandise.

The War in Europe

THE Germans raided various portions of Great Britain no less than four tis in the past week (July 28 to ugust 4). None of these ras appear to have done any mary damage nor to have rehed any important English towns, probably because th British anti-aircraft defees have been greatly inpred in the past few months a now seem able to cope w and to beat off this form of invader. The Germans us in the course of these ras one novelty, an aerial toedo, constructed on much the same pl as submarine torpedoes, whose use, hever, does not seem to have accomplhed anything of importance and is mentioned only because of its nelty.

he Picardy front on the western li was not the scene of fighting of the sae severity the past week as the week bre. Taking up the northern portion of his front first, that held by the Bish, on July 28, after a very severe cobat, the British succeeded in recapturing the village of Longueval and in driving the Germans well to the east thereof. This same day there was bitter hand-to-hand fighting all day in and around Pozières on the Bapaume road to the northwest of Longueval, but without decisive result. Fighting also took place in the Delville and Fourneaux woods, wherein the British gained some advantage.

The French, after remaining quiet for the opening day of the week, on Saturday launched an offensive on their front north of the Somme, from Hill 139, northeast of Hardecourt, south to the river, and after capturing a complete system of German trenches succeeded in reaching the outskirts of the village of Maurepas, as well as in taking the strategic point known as the Monacu farm. In the afternoon the Germans made desperate counter-attacks to recover the lost ground, the fighting being particularly severe around the Monacu farm, but were unsuccessful, and the French retained complete possession of the ground won in the morning. These counter-attacks were resumed on Monday, but the French held good and inflicted rather heavy losses on the assailants.

On Wednesday the situation north of the Somme continued stormy, but neither side improved its position. South of the river the French gained a few yards between Estrées and Belloy-en-Sauterre. After this, however, the activity dwindled away almost completely as far as infantry fighting is concerned, though the artillery combats continued for the rest of the week.

THE Verdun front was very quiet the first two days of the week; so quiet in fact as to be disposed of almost without mention in the official bulletins. On August 1, the Germans made an attack on the French position on the south of Thiaumont and Fleury, on the north front, and momentarily succeeded in penetrating the French first line trenches, but were almost immediately driven out by a counter-attack. Another attack on the French lines southeast of Fleury met with much the same fate. The next day the Germans renewed their attack on the French line south of Fleury toward Fort de Souville, and were successful in capturing a hillock immediately north of the fort, as well as French positions in the Laufée wood, a little northeast of Fort Souville, in which operations they took about 900 prisoners and some artillery.

The afternoon of the same day the French began an offensive from the Meuse River to the east, directed against Thiaumont fort and the village of Fleury, which afterwards developed into an important movement. Not only was Fleury village captured after a remarkably gallant and sustained charge but the French broke the German lines between this village and Fort Thiaumont to the northwest and pushed their advanced lines as far as the first slopes of Hill 320, and on the northern end of their line reached the walls of Fort Thiaumont itself.

All of this ground they were unable to retain, but night found them in complete possession of Fleury and with substantial gains to the northwest thereof. While these things were occurring on the Thiaumont-Fleury line another French attack, launched from the vicinity of Fort de Souville to the southeast, drove back the Germans and recaptured the hillock to the north of this fort as well as the trenches in the Laufée wood, which the Germans had taken the day before. In this fighting the French captured over a thousand prisoners as well as considerable artillery.

During the night, however, the Germans counter-attacked, and after furious fighting, lasting all night, appeared from the French bulletins to have recaptured the southern portion of Fleury, but the combat enlarged into a very desperate pitched battle, which is still continuing when this record closes.

The submarine campaign against the shipping of the Allies has been much more active, particularly in the Mediterranean, some sixteen ships of all sizes and nationalities being reported sunk.

The Austro-Italian front has to a very large degree relapsed into trench warfare of the most monotonous type. The Austrians, who retain on the Tyrol front a portion of the gains they made in May, have dug themselves in and seem to be able to repel the numerous Italian attacks. The Italians lost a couple of submarines during the week, one of which the Austrians sunk, while the other they captured, which about comprises the naval activities of the week.

As forecast in last week's article, the Russians captured the northeastern frontier town of Brody, in Galicia, on Saturday. This place is an important railroad center on the direct road to Lemberg, and is one of the places from which that city can be threatened. In the rest of Galicia the week's fighting, though animated at points, was resultless as far as any changes of importance are concerned. The Russians have succeeded in surrounding Lemberg on three sides, but an average distance of sixty miles therefrom. During the past week, little or no progress was made by the Russians in the operation, and the troops which took Brody have remained practically motionless.

In Volhynia, north of Brody, there has been heavy fighting, but the Russians have not yet been able to cross the line of the Stochod River in force, which they must do in order to succeed in reaching their objective in the region of Kovel.

The estimates of the damage caused by the explosions and the fire were given in the press as follows: National Storage Company plants and contents, including 30,000 tons of sugar, 24,000 bales of tobacco and large quantities of chemicals, $12,000,000; 85 cars, grain elevator, tugs and tracks of the Lehigh Valley Railroad, $1,000,000, 12 cars of the Central Railroad of New Jersey, $50,000; ammunition in cars and barges, $5,000,000; barges, and cargoes other than ammunition, $260,000; buildings on Bedloe's, Ellis and Governor's Islands, $15,000; plate and ordinary glass broken in buildings in New York, Brooklyn, Hoboken, Jersey City and elsewhere, about $1,250,000. (The shock was felt in Maryland, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York and Connecticut.)

BESIDES waking up a portion of the population of five states, the gigantic detonation on Black Tom Island woke up the officials in Jersey City to the jeopardy in which lives and property are put by the heavy traffic in war munitions at this point. In fact, it is just possible that the warning of this explosion was heard by public officials throughout the whole country. Investigations were begun by Jersey City officials with the same promptness and determination and efficiency that are displayed whenever an excited citizen discovers that his horse has been stolen from the unlocked barn. What these officials would do with the persons responsible for the state of things at Black Tom Island was quite startling to read. Railroad presidents and other dignitaries were to be jailed, not another ounce of explosive was to be permitted anywhere near Jersey City, and the war in Europe was to be stopped forthwith. But time heals all wounds, and at the time of this writing, remote from the date of the accident by fully five days, the punitive and preventive results of the disaster have already been reduced to stern warnings, and temporary police censorship of trains on these two railroads. Investigation appears to have shown that the letter of the law had been almost, if not quite, observed in the conduct of this business at this port; and of course, as everybody knows, when a fire starts and gets beyond control, anything may happen. That's all that was the matter at Black Tom Island. If the workmen had put the fire out quickly enough, this little story would never have been written—perhaps.

A World at Prayer

NOT only in those countries that are directly affected by the war, but in every land, prayers that peace may return to the world are ascending in a volume such as no previous age has witnessed. In neutral Scandinavia hundreds of prayer meetings are being held, and the ringing of church bells summoning the people to unite their appeals is heard on every side. Here in our own favored land the denominations have joined in supplicating the divine mercy to shorten the suffering. In a few countries, forms of public prayers have been widely circulated, the language of imploration being humble and reverent in interpreting the needs of the sorrowing multitudes.

Formal prayers, however, rarely appeal to the average individual, although in a great crisis and amid confusion and deep depression they may be adopted unreservedly. To the great majority of Christian people, the petition that rises spontaneously from the heart to find utterance at the lips is the only prayer that can adequately express the feelings and desires. Even the Lord's Prayer, familiar to all ages, is supplemented at a time like this by the human cry that is wrung from the heart through agony and distress. It is by such prayers that the very gates of heaven are stormed.

There are many who need to be helped to pray, and those who are equal to the task of leading others in prayer are few compared to the numbers who can only speak in broken and incoherent sentences. Yet to Him who knows and reads our hearts, the weak and halting accents are as acceptable as the prayer that is clothed in polished and perfect language. Unless the heart pleads, there is no real prayer; the service of the lips is then merely the outward complement.

Through these dark and sorrowful days, the Prayer League has been much on its knees, pleading that out of this terrible war the great Father of us all may bring renewed spiritual life and hope to the world; that the Church of Christ may be strengthened; and that rulers and peoples may be drawn to God and become obedient to his laws. Already the dark clouds are breaking. We note with joy the multiplying indications of a vast Godward movement to follow the war. And on this line we must keep on praying, with strong, unshakable confidence, that out of the universal turmoil and suffering a great blessing may yet come which will make men, nations and governments better than before.

May God in his wisdom and mercy bring this blessing to realization soon. Meanwhile, let all who believe on him and in the Gospel of his Son, the world's Saviour, keep on praying.

The Boom and the Boomerang

EXPERIENCE is a stern and costly teacher. When the war munitions traffic sprang up with mushroom-like rapidity nearly two years ago, it gave a cruel wrench to the inmost convictions of those who, believing that our nation should be neutral, could not reconcile it with our repeated declarations of a humane and friendly attitude toward all combatants alike. But the traffic was winked at by those who should have condemned it. Business was business! We put aside our scruples and went in to make hay while the sun shone, and to reap a harvest of profits while the war lasted. The longer it lasted, of course, the greater the profits. Hundreds of factories were transformed into shops for turning out these munitions of death in limitless quantities. Fortune smiled upon us and we put up more factories, until the whole land from Maine to Mexico was dotted with them. A few manufacturers with tender consciences refused to join the wild scramble for unholy riches, and even called it "blood money"; but they were a mere handful. "If Europe is determined to fight," said the money-makers, "why shouldn't we profit by it? Somebody must supply the munitions—why not we?" And supply them they did by the hundreds of thousands of tons, while thinking people stood aghast and shuddered.

In a single hour, in the quiet of a Sabbath morning, the eyes of the whole nation were suddenly opened to the fact that the boom might become a boomerang. With the roar of a volcanic inferno, munitions in the National Storage Company's warehouse on Black Tom Island, off the Jersey shore, exploded with a detonation that shook five states and was felt nearly a hundred miles. Just how many perished in the disaster is still uncertain. A few bodies were found, but many are missing, while scores of others were injured. The material damage by the explosion and the fires which immediately followed are roughly estimated at over $20,000,000. This gigantic disaster, coming after a long series of smaller explosions throughout the country, nearly all involving loss of life and property, is an object-lesson which may well be studied by all the municipalities which have permitted the munitions factories or warehouses to operate within or near their borders. Jersey City, which suffered so heavily through the Black Tom blow-up, has resolved to bar explosives and to compel the railroads, the dock authorities and others to cease bringing munitions within the city limits in future. But the peril is by no means confined to the cities; it is shared by numerous towns and villages along the lines of those railroads that are now carrying thousands of boxes of explosives every day. Any one traveling on the Eastern trunk lines can see the death-laden cars strung along the sidings by the hundred, awaiting transportation, and it is not a cheering sight. Explosions are bound to happen, whether from accident or carelessness or any other cause; and peaceful rural communities must suffer. What is to be done about it? The storage companies, railroads, docking concerns, and others who are engaged in the transportation or storing of death-dealing explosives, are a constant menace to the surrounding population. In every community there are laws which are designed to protect the public against such dangers. These laws should be enforced to the last letter, even though this should involve the criminal prosecution of civic officials who neglect their duty of protecting public life and property, and of the heads of railroads and steamship transportation corporations as well. "Safety First" is a good maxim to remember, and every imperiled neighborhood should see to it that nothing is left undone to prevent residents from sharing the fate of those who have already become victims of the recklessness of the war munitions traffic conductors. Any business that daily and hourly imperils the lives and property of our citizen should be absolutely isolated. If this cannot be done, then it should be suppressed altogether.

Chinese Story of the Deluge

IN the ages that have passed since books first began to be written, there has been no subject to which students of history and exploration have devoted more thought than that which deals with the identification of the site of Eden. Archeologists have searched the three continents of the Old World to find a locality which conformed to the Biblical description, and the literature of the subject would fill many books. Traditions were found which placed the cradle of the race in Armenia, Babylonia, the Caspian territory, Bactria, Syria, and midway between the Ganges and the Nile. In each of these places there has been some traceable resemblance, both in the grouping of rivers and in the mineral richness of the soil. Some have held that the earthly Paradise was in the Ceylonese plateau; others in Lebanon, and still others in Cashmere. But the effects of the Flood and of subsequent changes in the geology and topography of the world have made the absolute identification of Eden the puzzle of the archeologists.

The latest contributor to Edenic literature is Tse Tsau Tai, a Chinese scholar, who, in a little volume just issued at Hongkong, asserts that the real site is to be found in Chinese Turkestan, the plateau of Eastern Asia, and that the Chinese race originated there. Through this territory the river Tarim, with four tributaries, flows eastward. Moreover, it is a land of precious stones and minerals, whereas Chaldea and Mesopotamia have nothing of the kind. Further, he points to the ancient Chinese record, which says that the stones quarried by Noah after the flood were of five different colors, and were taken from the Tienshan Mountains. The "land of Shinar" he identifies with the Mongolian plain or the lowlands of Shensi, the latter being the ancestral home of the Chinese race. Panku was the Adam of the Chinese, who also called him Tien Hwang (divinely created). Of course he was a Chinaman.

More interesting than his speculations concerning the location of Eden are the author's quotations from the ancient Chinese record in question, which assigns to Fuki (Enoch) the invention of hieroglyphic writing, the beginning of Chinese art, and the first crude ideas of agricultural husbandry. The story of the Deluge, which recites how the mountain peaks were upheaved in a vast convulsion and the waters covered the earth, while Nu Wa Shih (Noah) rode safely in the ark, is fairly correspondent with the Genesis narrative. Ararat he identifies with a peak of the Sarikol Mountains. Taken as a whole, the Chinese record must be regarded as one of the many variants of the Creation and Flood stories, of which a number have been discovered. It can have little weight with experienced investigators, and is chiefly intere ng as showing that the Chinese have these tradi ns in common with others. It will not shake the th of the world's best scholarship, which has con to look upon the Mesopotamian plain as the sce of the first events in human history.

The Factory and the Fragrance

THERE was once a business concern orga ed for the manufacture and sale of a certain erfume. The perfume was produced from a are flower, which the company cultivated. The ble business of the concern was based upon and rev ed about the growing of that flower and the scatteri of its fragrance. Extensive flower and seed farms big laboratories for the extracting of the fragrance om the flowers; big machines for manufacturing ext ts, scented waters and powders; other machines for aking bottles and boxes, others for filling and king them; still others for printing labels, annou ng and naming fragrance. Artists and engravers re busy drawing, painting, and making designs for se perfume containers and for the firm's advertisin iterature. A big selling organization managed the es. It was a "going" business, all based on the m ng and dispensing of fragrance.

But with all the amazing equipment and orga zation and efficiency, business began to fall off. P ple would not buy. Those who did buy were dissat ed with their purchase. What was the matter?

Pictures on bottles and boxes just as pretty as er; advertising just as cleverly written; salesmen ju as original, bright, pushful, scientific and compe nt; heads of departments all careful; workmen all thful; machines all in good order. What was the atter? The flowers had lost their fragrance. E ner nature or the horticultural experts or the gard ers had failed. The flowers were no longer sweet. he perfume was no longer perfume.

"Which things are an allegory."

The church is just such a gigantic organizati as this. It was never better nor more efficiently o anized. There was never more bustle and activity out its enterprises. But trade is falling off. In ma localities people won't come and inspect and a ept what the church has to offer. Those who do com are dissatisfied. Clever advertising schemes are lau ed to boom trade and increase crowds. These succ in some places and for certain periods. But the despread and deep-rooted conviction is that someth is the matter, something is wrong, something is mi ng; Christian doctrine and Christian activity and istian experience have pretty generally lost eir fragrance.

And that fragrance is—Love. Not love that s gs from a strong mind and a determined will; not ve that is busy feverishly trying to set the world ht, but Love that comes down from the warm he of God. Love that steals into the soul through co mplating the Cross of Christ and trusting its p er. Love that brings to mind and soul real rest, real mfort, real delight, real friendliness, real concern f he gladness of others. Love such as used to mak he old-time Methodists shout for gladness. Lov for God that thrilled and fired the soul. Love that de the sky bluer and the flowers sweeter, that mad he mountains and the hills break forth before us nto singing and all the trees of the field to clap eir hands. Love that planted myrtle and fir where t ns and briers had been. Love that made sacrifices nd faced dangers, and gave itself for the saving and ering of others. Love that filled the soul with fragr ce, a fragrance that others could catch, and long — and, if they would, obtain.

Where is that lost fragrance of holy Love? ow can it be produced again? What is necessary in ler that the old-fashioned flowers that made it c be grown again?

To get back to God; to get back to our faith at God is love. To let God himself into our chu es and into our homes and into our hearts. To go ck to Pentecost. To believe that Jesus, dying on alvary, is the perfect picture of God. To let the me Holy Ghost with which Jesus was baptized ba ize our own souls. To be friends of his, as Paul and ter and James and John were his friends. To so ust God that we may be called, as Abraham was he friend of God. To walk with God now as E ch walked with him long ago. To have God's love ed abroad in our heart by the Holy Ghost that is en unto us.

One thing is needful—only one. All our effor nd activity come to nothing without it—an expe nce of love for God that makes us love all men. T is the fragrance which it is the church's business to joy and produce and scatter.

Bird Songs in Dark

PROFESSOR HARRIS BENEDICT offered an interesting course in bird lore at the University of Cincinnati and, as the amination, took his class at three k in the morning to the top of lle Hill, where the robins, thrushes, w larks and other birds make eir homes. It was too dark for bers of the class to see their teacher, but could hear the chorus of bird ls that broke forth, and each student was called on to name the rds as they starred in turn in the symphony. Coachman Rewarded

THE death of James Hobart oore, the Chicago multiaire, has made public a story of generosity and de between him and his man, William Beattie. During the vast financial operations ago Mr. Moore's credit was ertained, a sudden crash came, and e found himself almost a over night. It was then is coachman came to his "I was in an awful fix," Mr. Moore used to say. "I was less than nothing when came to me. He had been bank and drawn out every e had saved—$2,000. 'Take said: 'I got it from you and welcome to keep it as long want it.'" The sum was ed, and it served to tide over isis till better times came r. Moore was able to regain bting. He never forgot the of Beattie, but repaid him ly that the coachman is now over $100,000. THE record must go to Mrs. Amy D. inship, who began her education a Illinois log schoolhouse in 1847 still pursuing it at the age of 85 University of California. There ntries like China where intellecsts have for thousands of years the lines of social caste, and persons seeking entrance have unsuccessfully visited the university examination halls every year for half a century. This is an exaggeration of the value of a formal education, but nevertheless its value is very great. Education plus common-sense, plus a rectitude of life-purpose in following the light, goes to make up wisdom, which the teachers and philosophers of all ages and the prophets of the Old Testament frequently say is the greatest of all possessions. New York's Last Farmhouse

THE old Dyckman house, built in 1783, standing on the northwest corner of Broadway and Two Hundred and Fourth Street, has been formally presented to the City of New York, to be used as a historical museum. It is the only farmhouse on Manhattan Island, and exemplifies with its broad, graceful gambrel roof, solid stone walls, capacious Dutch ovens in the kitchen and narrow porch overlooking the old Bloomingdale road, all of the best architectural virtues of the early days of New York. The house and land, restored to seventeenth century style, was presented to the city by the descendants of the original Dyckman family, who settled on what is now known as the Dyckman tract over 250 years ago, and whose name has been associated since 1660 with the history and growth of the northern end of Manhattan Island. At the presentation ceremony Commissioner Ward in accepting the gift said: "This gift is particularly welcome, as it perpetuates the memory of a noble era in our history. It is a public service to keep before us the memory of such self-sacrificing patriots as were the builders and tenants of this household. Their virtues of patriotism, courage, industry, thrift and unselfish sacrifice for the good of their country provide an inspiring example to the present generation." The preservation of this, the last farmhouse on Manhattan Island, will do more; it will serve to keep fresh in the thoughts of the teeming thousands of city dwellers the truth that the farm is the backbone of our national life and the farmer the final custodian of our country's prosperity. In the cities of steel and iron, among the offices and the docks, in crowded streets, men forget that without Nature's yearly miracle of the crops and without the farmer no commerce and no manufactures could long go on. It is through the farm that God bestows from the willing earth the rich resources that feed the race. Here we have the "sinews of war" for the American people. It is not well that even in our larger cities we should get so far away from Nature as to lose from our hearts all sympathy and appreciation of her goodness. It is noteworthy that the Bible is filled with references to farming. Christ particularly loved and understood Nature, and in his teaching every phase of country life is drawn upon for illustration. "The Kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field." (Matt. 13 : 24.)

Save Your Old Papers

SECRETARY REDFIELD of the Department of Commerce at Washington has just sent out this appeal to the people of the country: "There is a serious shortage of raw material for the manufacture of paper. The collecting and saving of rags and old papers would greatly better existing conditions for American manufacturers. A large proportion of the paper and paper-board manufactured in the United States after it has served its purpose could be used over again in some class of paper. A large part of it, however, is either burned or otherwise wasted." This is a new phase of the general effort toward the conservation of national wealth through economy. Our national sin has been that of waste of those resources—timber, oil, coal, soil—which God has so lavished upon us. The older and smaller nations have long since learned to get along with far less; indeed, a family in Southern Europe or India or China could easily subsist on what an average American family throws away. There is no waste in God's world. He has enough and to spare, but throws nothing away. No ounce of energy, no grain of star-dust, no drop of dew is ever lost in all his vast universe of worlds. He saves everything for some good purpose, and finds even in the scrap-heap of human society, among those who are self-wasted or cast off by men, the materials for reconstructed lives of unselfish service. Jesus told us this so plainly in his stories of the Lost Coin and the Prodigal Son, and he taught practical economy by his example when he fed the five thousand. He told his disciples: "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." (John 6 : 12.)

Plows for Gold

FOR past generations tradition has declared that the Indians in the aboriginal days of Kentucky buried a pot of gold on a certain farm in Casey County. A few days ago the owner decided to institute a systematic search for the treasure. His powerful team of mules he hitched to a strong plow, and in the locality where the gold is supposed to be hidden he began going deep into the earth. The mules came to a sudden standstill when the plow struck an object that could not be moved. So certain that he had found the traditional pot the searcher was overjoyed and fainted. Passersby hurried to his assistance and he was revived and told those present what he was seeking. An excavation was made and it was proved the plow had struck a huge rock. The search for the supposed hidden treasure on the farm is a symbol of eight-tenths of the transactions for making money. The men let in on the ground floor, who got in on the "tip" of a friend, who own the machine the world is compelled to have, who have the "dead sure thing," who see money flashing in the light of their brilliant imagination, are all looking in vain for the pot of gold. The way to find the pot of gold on the farm is to plow deep like this man did, and then plant good seed, tend the crop faithfully, and reap the harvest. Most of the gold of America is found not in the mountains of California, or Colorado, or Alaska, but in the plowed fields of the plains. The divine plan for making money is not to find it in a pot in a field, but to coin it by honest toil. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." (Gen. 3 : 19.)

Woman Shoots a Bear

MRS. GEORGE M. PHILAN of Berlin, N. H., claims to be the first woman in New Hampshire to shoot a black bear from an automobile. This exploit occurred in the road in Pinkam's Notch. Mrs. Philan and her husband were driving from Nashua to their home, when the animal, which was a good size, waddled into the road in front of them. The car was stopped, and Mrs. Philan, who always has a rifle with her when traveling through the mountains, sent a bullet into the bear's head. Mr. and Mrs. Philan tumbled the bear into the car and brought it home. There were bears among the wilds of the Holy Land. There is this reference to the slaying of one that had stolen a lamb from the flock by the farmer's son. David said to Saul, "Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear." (I Sam. 17: 36.)

On the Excursion Boat

IT was evening on the Sound. The steamer slipped through the still water with only a gurgle at her prow and a foam-decked swirl at her helm. The twilight faded. The lights along the shore greeted and defied the gathering dusk. Now and again one greater than the rest would send a broad, steady shaft of light right to the steamer's rail, across the mirror-surface of the Sound. Yet there were other great lights that burned proudly and then blackened, only to glare again; and others burned white and red and white and red. And a woman watched them and knew that they were set to guide the mariner to the safe roadstead and the snug harbor, to warn him of shoals and reefs and treacherous currents. She remembered that the Christ had said, "Ye are the light of the world," and she wondered if her light burned steady and true, or if it flickered, or if it now and then lacked luster or bore a color of the world. There is but one haven from the storms of life, but one roadstead, but one way to peace. There is no need, as there is where harbors are many, for flickering lights. Only the pure white light of a consecrated life, illumined by the Spirit of the Christ and shining steadily through the trial and the stress and the strain of daily living, can guide human craft over the shoals of sin and the reefs of habit to the safe harbor: "Let your light so shine." (Matt. 5 : 16.)

Khartum, the City of Contrasts

By SAMUEL M. ZWEMER, D.D.

AT the junction of the White and the Blue Niles, 1,400 miles from Alexandria and 1,000 miles from Uganda, stands the capital of the Sudan, which but for the life and death of General Gordon might still be a struggling Sudanese village. Khartum means elephant's trunk and may well designate that long strip of land which separates the turbid waters of the White Nile from the clear and more rapid streams that come from the mountains of Abyssinia. Across the White Nile stretches the straggling ancient dervish capital, Omdurman, with a population of over 60,000; and it is practically a part of Khartum, as Brooklyn is of Greater New York.

At a fair in Omdurman

When one reflects that only about twenty years ago no white man, Christian, Moslem, or Jew, could have passed a single hour in this city without being killed or made a prisoner, and that today all races and religions meet under the protection of the Anglo-Egyptian government, the change seems marvelous. Where once fire and sword played havoc and the highest ideals of life were the low ideals of dervish rule, unspeakable in its degradation of womanhood, the horrors of the slave trade, and the fanaticism of religious hatred, now we see on every hand signs of economical, social, and moral progress.

The quays, streets, gardens, and public buildings present the picture of a civilized town, as regular and a good deal more ambitious than some metropolis in the growing West. The majority of the streets are wide, macadamized, and lined with beautiful trees. There is an excellent system of lighting, and tram-cars connect Khartum with the suburbs, from Gordon College on the east to Omdurman on the west, as well as with North Khartum across the Blue Nile. Luxurious express trains with dining and sleeping cars run twice a week from Khartum to Cairo.

On every hand one sees the contrast of two civilizations—that of Islam which is gradually but surely passing away, and that of Europe which dominates and supplants. And yet these two civilizations are still struggling for the mastery. They exist side by side in what might be termed armed neutrality. The Mahdi's tomb has been destroyed, but the splendid new mosque in the center of Khartum was erected by the government for Moslem worship. The Cathedral, erected in memory of Gordon, is a magnificent building, but like the mosque is still uncompleted. The two buildings seem to challenge each other as to which shall first see the finishing touch of the architect. From the minarets one hears the cry of the muezzin that "Mohammed is God's apostle"; and in the Cathedral they pray that His kingdom may come who brooks no rival, and that His will may be done throughout the Sudan—surely also by observing the Christian Sabbath.

The Courts of Justice rise in splendid architectural beauty, but the law that is administered in them is Mohammedan and medieval instead of Christian and progressive.

KHARTUM offers, as no other city, the contrast of two religions, that of the mosque and of the cathedral, of the Crescent and of the Cross, the standards of the prophet of Mecca and of our Saviour Jesus Christ. The city has two calenders, dating one from 622 A. D. and one from the birth of our Saviour. Outside of Khartum, in the vast Sudan, Islam still seems to be chiefly a veneer, and the negro blood carries with it a characteristic jovial friendship and responsiveness to kindness; but in Khartum and Omdurman Islam is stiffening and deepening its grip on the people.

The government regulations under which missionary work is permitted in the Sudan are thoroughly un-Christian, and put a handicap even on school work. When one looks at the map and considers the vast area north of the tenth parallel in which, according to the printed regulations, no mission station is allowed to be established and yet where mission stations of four societies exist and are doing splendid work, one is reminded of the words in the second Psalm: "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall hold them in derision."

Gordon College and the primary schools connected with it in the Sudan, although they are Mohammedan schools and observe Mohammedan holidays and teach the Koran and Moslem ethics, have nevertheless been a great stimulus to education. The children are eager to learn, and statistics which I have gathered show a great increase in the imports of paper and printed matter. In 1914, for example, the total value of books, mostly Mosle ported into the Suda £6,062. The following y had risen to £7,714. very small proportion consists of Bibles for the and Foreign Bible Soci school books for the mission schools. Nine of it is Moslem literature.

We may thank God that the British and Bible Society entered the open door of Khartum diately after the surrender of the city. At th fair held in Omdurman on King George's Day this society opened a booth (see our illustratio the sale of Scriptures from its depot is stea creasing. It was my privilege to put a copy Bible in the library of Gordon College and in th of some of the Moslem professors of the school

The Church Missionary Society and the A United Presbyterian Mission are doing e medical and educational work in Khartu Omdurman. There is also a Roman Catholic and an Orthodox Coptic and a Greek church.

GREAT strides have been made in educatio the days of the Mahdi, but all government tion is Moslem. The total number of pupils at under instruction in government schools, in Gordon College, is 5,700. The number in schools, Roman Catholic and Protestant, 1,500 more. As an educational institution Memorial College ranks high. With it are co the Welcome Research Laboratories, whic world-wide celebrity. There is a fine depart technical training, and the methods of instruct in every sense up to date. But from first to the text-books used in the primary and se schools are Mohammedan, and nothing in the the pupil's attention to the great facts of Chris its ethics, and its civilization. The gove primary reading-book begins with the fo prayer, which is put most inappropriately o a frontispiece consisting of a portrait of Gordon: "Praise be to God, who taught ma he did not know, and may prayers and peace the seal of all the prophets, Mohammed, and u family and companions."

Everywhere there is the contrast of these tw and one longs for the day when the missiona shall triumph and the British government learn the Sudan also "man shall not live by bread alo that there is "a peace which passeth all unde ing" in Jesus Christ, compared with which Pax Britannica is of small value.

Gordon's prayer-mat hangs in the Cathed Bible and journals rest in the museum of College, his statue faces southward toward t unoccupied Sudan. But his Christianity is government ideal. As I lingered near the stat and again during my recent visit, the words of t pel seemed to come from the lips of Gordon "Do the rulers know indeed that this is the very C

The Sunshine of Love

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY is dead. And all of the country is mourning him. Grimly tired business men, blasé society folk, old ladies with silver hair, and little children just able to read, will miss him. Cartoonists and columnists have laid by their joke-making to do him honor, and high government officials stand aside with uncovered heads. For James Whitcomb Riley was the poet of simple things; a poet who did not stir up vast problems and unanswerable questions, but wrote verse that every one could understand, verse that brought tears to hardened eyes, verse that brought smiles to lips that were tired and songs to worried souls.

ONCE upon a time, many weary years ago, a great king had a garden. He tended the garden himself. With his royal hands he pulled away rank weeds, and killed villainous bugs and grub worms. He even raked and hoed and dug with golden garden tools. For the king loved his garden above all else.

In other courts, ambassadors from far lands usually brought rich silks, and warm furs, and gleaming jewels, for the pleasure of the monarchs. In the court of this king, ambassadors and great men brought tender plants, and brown bulbs, and twisted roots that still held a spark of life in them, as gifts. For people the wide world over knew that this king loved his garden above all else, and they knew that a rare blossom would give him more joy than a glowing ruby or a matchless pearl.

With all this care and attention and love one would think that the king's garden would have been the most beautiful spot in the world. But it wasn't. For something kept the rare flowers and the brown bulbs from growing; something killed the spark of life that dwelt in the twisted roots. And though the king hoed, and raked, and dug deep trenches with his golden tools, the garden was only a well-planned plot of ground, with ghosts of flowers growing in it. The garden was only a place that might have been beautiful.

Of course the king was sad would be sad, too, if your most b plans didn't materialize—if yo wonderful dreams exploded li pricked soap-bubbles. The king only sad; he was vastly annoyed

"Why," he would say pe "why doesn't my garden grow? given it everything that a gard have. I have given it skilled attention. I have watched g and artists lay out the beds in t pleasing way. I have collect plants; and the plants droop. self, have tended the garden v toil of my hands; and still it grow!" So said the king, and h as he said it.

WELL, all the sighing and sadness and vexation in the world will not make a garden grow. The king, after long experimenting, discovered that his garden, despite tears and threats and anger, remained the same sullen disappointment.

And then, one day, the king went out in his chariot to take the air. Instead of driving, as he usually did, along the wide and popular highroads, some god of fortune bade him turn his horse down a shady little path that led along untrodden ways.

It was a new experience to the king, that drive down the narrow by-path; and a new experience is always interesting. For a time, in the delight of exploring, he forgot the garden that would not grow; and then, suddenly, just as he had successfully forgotten it, he drove out into a small sunny clearing. There was a thatched cottage in the center of the clearing; a neat little cottage with green vines trailing over the doorway. But it wasn't the cottage that the king noticed. It was the garden that lay all around the cottage; a garden that spread out long arms to greet each wayfarer; a garden that bloomed fragrantly, luxuriantly, as he had dreamed that his garden might some time grow.

Fascinated, the king caused his driver to rein in his horses, and stepped out of his chariot. Still more fascinated, he walked through the beautiful garden and rapped at the cottage door. A little bowed man with white hair and merry blue eyes opened to him.

"I am the ruler of this land," said the king; "and, as I was passing your door, I saw your wonderful flowers. For years I have coveted just such a garden. Can you not tell me how you manage to grow such marvelous plants?"

The little old man was visibly embarrassed.

"I," he stammered, "if your gracious majesty would let me see your garden—" He hesitated.

The king waved his hand in the direction of the waiting chariot.

"You shall come with me—now!" he said. "perchance you may see wherein my gardening is at fault!"

AND so they drove down the lane together, the king and the little old man. And before long they came to the king's sullen garden that would not bloom. And quite suddenly, when the little old man saw it, he laughed. The king turned to him sharply.

"Why is my garden a failure?" he questioned angrily. "Why does my garden wither? Can you tell?" And the little old man answered.

"O king," he said, "you have given your garden the best of care. You have pulled up the weeds and destroyed the poisonous insects and worms. You have watered it, and pruned it, and piled rich soil about the roots of every plant. But you have forgotten one thing.

"The tall trees that stand in your garden have wide green branches. And these branches cast their heavy shadows over the garden beds that you have tended so faithfully. Cut away some of these branches, O king, and your garden will grow!"

"Then," faltered the king, amazed, "then the trouble is——"

"Most gracious majesty," said the little old man, "there is not enough of God's sunshine in your garden. And without sunshine no garden will grow!"

THE world is a vast garden filled with sturdy plants, and rare delicate blossoms, and clinging vines, and—weeds. Some parts of the garden are tropical tangles of growth, but other parts are stunted and withered.

Now the world, to be a beautiful, successful, Godlike place, should bloom beautifully, wonderfully, to his glory. And so the teachers and preachers, and the scientists and doctors, and the politicians and kings and peasants, try their hand at gardening. And they rake, and hoe, and dig trenches, and kill murderous grubs, and put rich earth around the roots, and water the flowers—with tears, sometimes.

And yet the sorrow of it is that some parts of the garden do not grow as they should. For there isn't enough of God's sunlight in it.

That is why men and women and little children are mourning the death of James Whitcomb Riley. That is why a whole nation will miss him. He may not have crushed disease, or made great inventions; he may not have enacted laws or started gigantic reforms. But he cut away some of the heavy dark branches that hid the blue sky from us; and with his songs—songs that brought smiles to tired lips and answering songs to weary souls—he let some of God's sunshine into the garden of the world; and that sunshine made the garden sweeter, and purer, and bigger, and more wonderful.

And that, be he king or president, artist or doctor, preacher or poet, is the greatest thing that any man may do.

Compensation

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

I WAS not made for pomp and fame;
I was not meant to carve my name
In letters that would always live.
I have no magic power to give
To ease the world of strife and pain,
To turn its mind from sordid gain.

AND yet God gives a gift to each
The gift of song, of mirth, of speech;
The gift of laughter swift and light
To take away the dread of night.
And what is fame, when each one gives
A bit of sunshine while he lives?

I WAS not made for fame or power;
And yet, in some far distant hour,
When I have started on the way
Whence none return, should some one say,
"Her song has made my life more blest,"
I shall be satisfied to rest.

Among the Workers

THE Baptists of the Northern Convention have designated Sunday, October 29, 1916, as "Five Year Program Day." On that day the plans and purposes of the program will be given new emphasis, and the Baptist churches will enter on the second of the five years with their goals set and their forces organized for accomplishment.

FLORIDA passed a law a year or more ago which prohibited white persons from teaching in negro schools, and vice versa. Until recently there was no attempt to enforce the law. Now it is announced that the courts of the state have declared the law unconstitutional. Several members of a Catholic sisterhood had been arrested for conducting a negro school, but the dismissal of the case against them removes the threat of the law against the Protestant schools as well.

KESWICK COLONY, near Lakewood, N. J., well known to Christian Herald readers, is still helping men to forget drink and to make a new start toward worthy manhood, and begin life anew under religious influence. Keswick now owns free of incumbrance over seven hundred acres near Whiting, N. J., seven miles from a saloon. Five cottages furnish accommodation for thirty-five men, and a sawmill furnishes employment in summer. Men can either work their way through or come as boarders at $4 per week, but all must observe the rules of the colony. Keswick was founded seventeen years ago with $1.87, a definite purpose, and faith in God, and since its founding more than 5,000 men have come there for a new start

THE following story, told as true, is all too typical of the faith of many Christians of today:

Two little sisters became badly frightened during a severe electrical storm. Their mother told them that God was taking care of them, and to go ask him to protect them. The two little ones went into the bedroom, but having heard that feathers would keep lightning away they decided to "make assurance doubly sure," and each knelt on a feather pillow with another pillow over her curly head.

Little Mary was praying most earnestly.

"O Lord, I'm awful glad that you are taking care of me. I 'ist know no matter how big that thunder gets, you won't never let it hurt us." But just here the pillow slipped from her head, and she interrupted her assurances of faith in God's power to cry wildly "Oh, Edna, grab my pillow and put it back quick 'fore the lightning shoots me! Oh, can't you hurry? There, now I guess if I've got enough fevvers the Lord can take care of me."

Suppers Out-of-Doors

Puffed Wheat or Rice in a bowl of milk or cream. What a dish for out-door suppers.

Great bubbles of grain—eight times normal size—toasted, thin, flaky and crisp.

Whole grains, not mere flour foods. All the minerals, all the gluten in them.

Every food cell steam-exploded. Every granule easily digests. Every atom feeds.

And each of the Puffed Grains—three in all—gives a different-tasting dish.

Also Odd-Hour Foods

You serve Puffed Grains for breakfast—with cream and sugar or mixed with fruit. And you call them breakfast dainties.

They are more than that. Puffing makes whole grains wholly digestible. Every food cell is exploded. Digestion is both easy and complete.

Nothing is so fitted for between-meal food. Let hungry children eat them dry, or douse with melted butter. With their nut-like taste and their fragile texture they are like confections.

They mean less candy, less pop corn, less cookies.

Puffed Wheat 12c
Puffed Rice 15c
Except in Far West
Corn Puffs—Bubbles of Corn Hearts—15c

Prof. A. P. Anderson, the food expert, invented this method for cooking grain. The process is long and difficult. The grains must be shot from guns. A hundred million steam explosions occur in every kernel.

This is not done to make the foods delightful, but to make them hygienic. It is done to break up all the food cells, while baking breaks less than half.

The results are most enticing. So there is every reason why these great grains should be often served in puffed form.

Keep them all on hand. Some like one best, some another. And all like to change about.

First Aid Book—10c
What to Do in Any Emergency

We issue this book for half what it costs us to foster efficient first aid.

It was written by a famous surgeon, now a Major in charge of U. S. Army Field Hospital. It tells what to do in any form of accident or emergency—

In shocks and sickness—
In burns and bruises—
In wounds and sprains—
Hemorrhage or fainting—
Drowning or electric shock—
Any sort of poisoning.

The book contains 128 pages and over 100 illustrations. It is a complete and authentic reprint of our book that sells for 50 cents. Every home at some time has urgent need for it, when a life may be at stake.

We ask 10 cents merely as evidence of serious intent. The book costs us much more.

Be Double-Sure

This is part of our effort to prevent careless wound-dressing. And to help you fight germ infections.

Another part is to make dressings that are sterile. And enable you to keep them sterile. We are at war with half-way measures. We urge you to be double-sure.

What You Need

What you need in the house—all the time—is B&B Absorbent Cotton, B&B Bandages and Gauze, B&B Adhesive Plaster.

You need the B&B brand for the following reasons:

B&B Cotton goes through 22 processes. Our Cotton and Gauze are twice sterilized, once after being sealed.

B&B Arro Brand Cotton and Handy-Fold Gauze are both put up in germ-proof envelopes—enough for one use in each. They keep their sterility for years.

Both are also put up in handy packages. No need to remove the roll. Cut off what you need and leave the rest untouched.

B&B Adhesive

B&B Adhesive Plaster is rubber coated. It is prepared especially for surgeon's use. But it sticks to anything without heating or wetting. And it stays stuck. Every home has a hundred uses for mending rubber, glass and wood.

Our First Aid Book tells how these things are used. Also hundreds of other things—knowledge you should keep on file. We will mail it for ten cents. Address First Aid Dept.23.

Always call the Doctor—remember First Aid is only first aid

Acts 20 : 16-38

Paul's Farewell to the Ephesians

By Arthur H. Howland

MANY Biblo scholars have wished fervently that Luke had included more material in his narrative in the Acts. Between the first and sixth verses of the twentieth chapter occurred events of thrilling interest and vast importance, but Luke passes by them, leaving them unnoticed.

One of the most difficult points of New Testament study is the placing of the time, place and circumstances of Paul's various epistles, making the narrative of the letter fit into the records of Luke's narrative. We are approaching now the closing period of the great apostle's career. He was on his way toward Jerusalem with a large committee of delegates from various churches and provinces, bearing to the church at Jerusalem the great collection that had been taken. It has been suggested that the committee was made so large in order that no one man would need to carry a very large sum, and also in order that there could be no possible suspicion of the funds being misapplied. Various groups of the givers sent their own delegate or delegates along bearing the funds.

We can imagine that was a great service in the church at Troy when all these Spirit-filled messengers from the other churches gathered there, joined by Luke and by Paul, who was of course to be the preacher of the occasion. No wonder the meeting lasted far into the night, the Christian believers listening with rapt attention to the rugged apostle as he preached "the unsearchable riches of Christ."

YOUTH is pretty much the same in all ages and in all lands, and even at this service one young man went to sleep. The rest were so attent upon Paul's words that they did not observe the sleeping Eutychus slipping down in his chair and toward the edge of the "third loft."

There is a cry as he falls and disappears. Those who lift him up from the ground believe him dead, but Paul hurries down from the pulpit and takes the young man in his arms and cries to the panic-stricken congregation, "Trouble not yourselves; for his life is in him." Whether the narrative implies that life was really extinct and was brought back by the faith of Paul, or whether Luke means that his friends merely thought the boy dead and Paul declared he was not, yet there was clear evidence of the kindly interference of the Lord, in whose honor they had come together. For the boy was not seriously hurt by his long fall, but was ready early the next day to join the other believers on the pier from which Paul's friends were to sail.

The meeting had continued during the whole night, the "love feast" being eaten and Paul resuming and continuing his discourse "till break of day."

FOR some reason or other Paul decides not to accompany his friends on their vessel but to go by foot to the next port, Assos, on the other side of Cape Lectum. There is something delightfully human about this desire of Paul for a long walk, to be taken most likely alone. Not even Luke goes with him, for, describing the meeting at Assos, he writes: "We took him in." People who like to think like to walk. It makes good atmosphere for praying, too.

The apostle was anxious to reach Jerusalem not later than the day of Pentecost, so he could not take time to leave the coast and visit Ephesus; but he sends word to the elders of the church to come to Miletus and meet him there. We do not know whether this conference took place on the sand of the seashore, or in some quiet corner of the pier, or in the room of som nn, or in the home of some friend at M us; but we do know that Paul's talk ith these Ephesian elders as he bids em good-by gives us the perfect pict of a Spirit-filled Christian worker an ontains many rare hints for the co uct of a Christian congregation. a casual reading it appears that au had a good deal to say about hi elf. But notice how all his talk abou im- self is merely to lead their minds the Lord. It is important also to ol rve that Paul had lived such a an straight, self-sacrificing life at Ephesus that he could point to it fearlessly and challenge them to accuse him of unfaithfulness or compromise. "With all humility of mind, and with many tears and trials," he had served the Lord. Twice he declares that he did not keep back any truth he thought they ought to know. It is interesting to note that Paul's letter to the Ephesian church, written some time later, contains the most deeply and richly spiritual teachings and exhortations of all his writings. It is in this letter that he rejoices in his call to preach "the unsearchable riches of Christ." It is in this letter that he prays that these believers "might be filled with all the fulness of God," and declares that, wonderful as his prayer may be, God is able "to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think." So we are not surprised at Paul's assertion that his preaching to the Ephesians during his residence there had been deep and searching. "I have not shunned," he reminds them, "to declare unto you all the counsel of God."

Many preachers, Sunday school officers and teachers and other Christian workers hesitate to expound the secrets of the higher life and urge their hearers to enter. We are afraid of being misunderstood; we are afraid that our urgings will be rejected; but Paul, at least in his work with the Ephesian Christians, talked fully about the breadth and length, the depth and height of the love of Christ, pressing his hearers to enter into an experience of full and rich enjoyment of that knowledge-surpassing divine affection.

PAUL not only had talked to people in their public gatherings, but labored with them "from house to house," winning them by families and by individuals to the fulness of the divine life. He was not covetous. He was not after their "silver, or gold, or apparel," and they knew it. Paul does not seem to have liked to take collections for himself. He would take collections for others, but he preferred at Ephesus, Corinth and Thessalonica, and doubtless in many other places, to work with his own hands at his trade of tent-making, so that the people to whom he preached need not be burdened for his support.

Here is another good study for the adult classes: the comparative advantages of churchly support and self-support while doing Christian work. Look up the cases of Christian workers of the present and past who have followed Paul's method of supporting themselves while giving time and strength to the work of soul-winning.

Paul declares that he knows he will meet trouble on the journey he is about to take. Bonds and afflictions await him. "But," he declares firmly, "none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto me, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God."

Some people merely drift along. Some have a certain amount of self-propulsion but are easily deflected from their course. Paul went straight forward like a great ocean liner, keeping his course straight in spite of all winds and tides. He had power within, the power of the Holy Ghost, and the power of his own great and greatly trained will.

He warns them that after his departure other teachers will arise trying to draw them from the truth. Even some of their own number will try to lead them away from the foundations of the Gospel. He asks them to remember the three earnest years of his work and warnings and pleadings.

Now he commends them to God. He himself is going from their sight. He feels sure that he shall never see them again. But God is to stay with them. He urges them to be true to the message of God's grace, that grace which is to build them up and to give them at length an eternal inheritance among all the sanctified.

Ask one of the advanced pupils to look up the subsequent history of the church at Ephesus. It is full of interest.

Note especially Rev. 2 : 1-7.

HAYNES
AMERICA'S FIRST CAR

Flexibility

YOU can throttle the Haynes "Light Six" down to slower than a mile an hour without shifting from high gear. Inside of seven and a half seconds you can speed up to thirty miles an hour from a standing start.

This unequalled flexibility, means that you can do what you want to do, when you want to do it, with the Haynes.

In city driving, the bugaboo of frequent gear shifting is removed. You speed along or just creep, all on high. You can beat the whole bunch in the get-away, when the traffic cop gives the "go ahead."

But in country driving, you are the most appreciative of Haynes flexibility. When you come to that bridge with the rough approach at the foot of the steep hill, you can slow down till the bumps register as mere billows—then climb the hill on high, gaining speed at every turn of the wheels.

You ride behind the motor that develops the most power of any of equal bore and stroke. You ride in a car that is big, roomy and easy riding—a car that is distinctively beautiful, and elegantly finished—a car that most important of all is light-weight.

This means that to enjoy the Haynes with its POWER, SPEED, FLEXIBILITY, and COMFORT, is actually cheaper, because of low upkeep, than driving many cars of lower price and less satisfactory service.

The Haynes dealer in your city is ready to give you all the facts and a thorough-going demonstration.

Jesus' Command and the Spirit of Jesus

B. Y. P. U. Matt. 28 : 19, 20; 20 : 25-28.
(Conquest Meeting)

JESUS had the degree of Master of Service. He allowed himself to be called Master, but he demonstrated his authority not by making people serve him but by himself serving other people. He told his followers that the way to highest mastery was the way of lowly service. The way to become a real king is to make people love you by helping them.

But human nature resents this doctrine; human nature likes to have its own way at once; it likes to assert itself, to make other people submit, and surrender, and serve.

All this is contrary to the spirit of Jesus: "Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your servant; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your bond-servant." That is the teaching he bids his followers carry and exemplify. That is the teaching that began in his day and the day of his immediate followers to turn the world upside down. It is for this teaching that he promises supernatural, infinite power. His farewell, as recorded by Matthew, includes the promise that as they go teaching these things he himself will be ever with them, even unto the end of the world. He had just said, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." While his followers are on this errand all this power is at their disposal.

But the thing to do is to begin on Cedar Avenue, or the Bolivar Turnpike, or wherever else you may live, to show this spirit and to present this teaching of Jesus. "Uncle Tom" brought the sweetness of the Gospel into his master's home. Many another servant or employee has won his employer or his chief to the way of life. Many a Christian has conquered his enemy by serving him, thus turning his enmity to love. The world's best minds are learning that the way of mind health and soul health is the way of service. We shall learn at length that the way of national health is the way of service to other nations.

Begin now by letting Jesus change your own heart, giving you the spirit of love for others, which shall make you want to help and serve and cheer them, "even as the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto but to minister."

How Associations Affect Character

Epworth League. I Cor. 5 : 33; II Cor. 6 : 14; Acts 14, 18, 19.

ARE you a chameleon or a paint-pot? A chameleon, you know, takes the color of whatever it happens to be sitting on. A paint-pot colors things up to suit itself.

A Christian should, of course, be gentle, self-sacrificing, regardful of the rights of others. But on the other hand he should be so sure of his principles, so firm in his experience, so confident of his heaven-sent strength, that he will change any atmosphere, any environment he may enter.

Sometimes a spiritually minded Christian will become a member of a cold, formal congregation, and his piety and zeal will in time revive and energize the whole church. But often matters turn out just the other way. A warm, earnest Christian finds himself in a spiritually lifeless atmosphere and gradually succumbs to the surrounding dulness.

Make up your mind to live so near Christ, to be so true to him, to be so filled with his strength and gladness, that you will change for the better the character of every friend and companion, the atmosphere of every group of which you are a part.

It is the final ord f appeal. It sums up her ex- emi; and it is wasted upon the heed- ss a It is not from that stolid figure th doorway that she can hope for erc

Bu f you had chanced to be a tour- , l happened to have influence ith e authorities in that country, d ppened at that moment to be ssi that spot, and you heard that f mercy and saw from whence it me would those Scriptural words ov come to your mind?

To sk that question of any Chris- n r n or woman is to answer it.

Up unquestionable evidence the mer n people are told today that thousands of families have been driven from their homes, their villages, their very country, crying out to their tormentors for mercy and receiving none; crying out to a war-deafened world for mercy and receiving none; crying out, with what little hope is left in their breaking hearts, to you Christian men and women of America, crying out to you for mercy.

In this unparalleled time of woe to the women and children of much of Europe and Asia, what doth the Lord require of thee? In the vernacular of the day, we want to put this right up to Christian Herald readers. We make it a concrete case of an applied Bible. We set you face to face with this fearful need. We want you to hear day and night that unceasing cry for mercy which is being wrung from the starved lips, the bruised lips, from pitiful, trembling lips of helpless mothers and helpless aged and innocent children, Have mercy on us.

We want you to hear this cry because it has got to be answered by human hearts. God rules in a mysterious way his mercies to perform. It is not for us to question these ways. It is for us to beware lest we hinder them.

What doth the Lord require of thee in this matter?

Do you think it would be worth while to chance a dollar on the expectation that it would get to Armenia or Belgium or "somewhere" in the war zone in time to keep a whole family alive for one more week, with just that much more opportunity for them to get on their feet?

Do you feel merciful five dollars' worth instead of one dollar? or even ten dollars' worth? or even one hundred dollars' worth?

In that interesting chapter of Ecclesiastes that we all believe has largely to do with charitable acts, we are admonished to cast our bread upon the waters because we shall find it after many days; and, further along, to sow our seed in the morning, and in the evening to withhold not our hand; for we do not know which will prosper, nor whether they both shall be alike good.

Acting on that inspired hint that the Father of us all would have us do the thing that comes to hand and leave the results to him, let us of the Christian Herald Family who are able to do so, even at the sacrifice of our own personal desires, be merciful on a Christlike scale, and with Christlike promptness, to these helpless people who have been trodden under the heel of war. If religious persecution accounts for most of the horror in Armenia, yet it has come through the occasion of war, nevertheless. Homes have been irretrievably swept away, lives have been hurt beyond healing, but still these human hearts beat on and bodies must be clothed and fed. These countless families must be touched by the soothing and sustaining hand of Christ; and the soothing and sustaining touch, dear Christian Herald friends, can be given at this time in no other way than through material help.

Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old? . . . He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?

GIFTS for the relief of the widows and orphans of the war are transmitted with all possible expedition to our committees now organized in eleven countries. Where it is specifically desired, gifts are sent into a designated country. Please address The Widows and Orphans Relief Fund, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

The exhibit will be oup about a collection of pictorial and her nains of the Reformation period, with replicas of famous scenes and buildings, giving a complete graphic presentation of the Reformation. Around this central group will be arranged exhibits giving a survey of what has been done and what is being done in every line of religious endeavor by every branch of the Protestant Church, and by all the organizations in which the churches unite. The exhibit will be shown first in Greater New York and later in other large centers of the country.

STANDING on the platform of "Young Women at Work for Young Women," Philathea Bible classes have since 1893 been organizing throughout the country, the membership now exceeding 600,000. Philatheas are affiliated with the nation-wide organization of Baraca Bible classes in the world-wide Baraca-Philathea Union. The classes are now preparing for the next year's campaign with the slogan "A Million Young Women for Christ." The Philathea Bible Class, like its brother organization the Baraca Bible Class, was first organized at the First Baptist Church in Syracuse, N. Y. This class, formed in 1893, has seen 300 of its members join the church. The Baraca Class of the same church has led 700 men into church membership. The church membership now numbers nearly 2,500. The congregation is now worshiping in a new church which has cost over $600,000 and which is open all day and all night. The church is equipped for every kind of institutional work, including hotel facilities.

WE would again remind our readers of the case of the aged minister and his wife whom they have been aiding so kindly these last two years or more. A little group of friends have voluntarily borne the burden of supporting these aged servants of Christ, both of whom are well over seventy years of age. The old pastor, after more than fifty years of service in the Gospel, is laid aside on account of physical infirmities, and his wife is a confirmed invalid. Any reader who feels led to do an act of real benevolence has an opportunity here. Inquiries addressed to the Christian Herald will be answered by giving full particulars concerning this most worthy case.

THE recent investigation of the affairs of the Williamsburg (N. Y.) Mission to the Jews, which was conducted by Rev. J. F. Carson, Hugh R. Monro and E. B. Buckalow, has resulted in finding that the charges brought against Rev. Leopold Cohn personally, and also as to the conduct of the mission work, are wholly unsustained.

Reviewing a Great Success —and its Successor

Just about one year ago the whole country was sitting on edge in anticipation of our introducing the sleeve-valve Knight motored car.

Everyone knew that practically all of the leading European car manufacturers had adopted the sleeve-valve motor in preference to all others. Everyone knew of its wide and sweeping success.

So they patiently waited!

In Europe the Knight motored car had been selling at from $4000 to $8000.

But it had been rumored that we would offer a Knight motored car at a price that would be revolutionary.

So thousands of people who were on the verge of buying other cars—waited.

Then came the Willys-Knight announcement.

From our initial announcement alone our production was oversold for six months.

As the new Willys-Knight cars went into use and the remarkable ability of the motor received actual demonstration, thousands and thousands of additional orders continued to pour in.

On all sides people were astounded at the Willys-Knight performance.

The smoothness of operation; the practical elimination of gear shifting; the absence of carbon troubles; the giant power, coupled with extreme quietness; its economy and all around simplicity immediately established a new standard of motor car efficiency.

So that today the Willys-Knight motor car is pointed to and conceded to be one of the great substantial successes of the industry.

With considerable gratification we now make another Willys-Knight announcement.

Of the sleeve-valve motor we need say but little. In the hands of tens of thousands of owners it has stood up and delivered far in excess of any of our descriptions or claims.

Probably the most distinguished feature of the new Willys-Knight is the striking body design.

The body is much longer—and lower. It has that fashionable double cowl feature. The new harmonious and graceful lines now make the Willys-Knight one of the most attractive motor cars of the year.

The wheelbase has been lengthened to 121 inches.

It now seats seven passengers.

The rear springs are now cantilever—the easiest riding springs in the world.

The quiet spiral bevel drive gears are continued.

Finished in rich French Blue with battleship gray wheels, and highly polished aluminum fittings, this newest Willys-Knight is now one of the country's smartest motor cars.

Demonstrations now.

Questions and Answers

MRS. I. B. L., Mo., writes: I always craved to do a great work for the Lord. I wanted to give a great amount of money for his work, but was always denied that privilege. Then I wanted to do what I could. I had a class of boys in Sunday school, and was leader of the Junior Young People's Union But I was stricken down with tuberculosis, and am now not able to do anything. I know I am saved, but can't understand why, when I want to work for God, I am denied the pleasure, while others, who could work if they would, are doing nothing. Christian people tell me that I am doing the work now that I wanted to, just by being patient and cheerful in my affliction. But I do not feel patient at all, although I try to appear so.'

Look up the sweet story of Mary, Martha and Jesus—Luke 10 : 38-42. It would be a good thing to read it several times a day for many days. Notice that Jesus said; "One thing is needful." Only one thing—that is to be in communion with him. It is absolutely impossible for us to estimate the value of the various tasks God assigns his children. Have you read M. E. Waller's beautiful novel, "The Wood-Carver of 'Lympus," the story of a strong young man whose back was broken by a timber accident and who learned that other kinds of work were as important as lumbering? The most important line of that beautiful Gospel hymn, "I'll Go Where You Want Me to Go, Dear Lord," is the last line in the refrain and of the last stanza:

> "I'll be what You want me to be."

Read again Paul's testimony to God's better way—II Cor. 12 : 7-10, the statement of his great ambition, "That the power of Christ may rest upon me," and his amazing discovery, "When I am weak, then am I strong." You have a rare privilege of spending so much time alone with God. If you are truly patient and listen he will give you precious messages, which will bless the lives of those who come to see you and to whom you may write. Of course, however, it may be that God is trying your faith for another purpose; he may want you to take his gift of healing by faith, and use the new gift of health and life in active service. Have you memorized George Matheson's great hymn, "O Love, that Wilt not let me Go"? And do you know that other hymn for sufferers, "God's Anvil"? Also "Sweet Will of God"?

From Chauncey Yellow Robe, a full-blooded Sioux Indian, the Mail-Bag has this interesting and timely letter: "I have read an article in your Christian Herald, July 12, recalling the history of General Custer's battle, June 25, 1876, and adding, 'On the fortieth anniversary of this event, it was reported that 1,500 Sioux Indians on reservation had volunteered for service with the Federal army in Mexico.' This report is true, and today there are large numbers of American Indians on duty with the regular army and national guards from various states on the Mexican border. There are five full-blooded Sioux Indian young men (direct descendants of the warriors who defeated General Custer and his command on the Little Big Horn, June 25, 1876) now with the South Dakota State National Guard, ordered to the Mexican border for service, without question of color or race. These five young men, who are well versed in military tactics, were schoolboys from the Rapid City Indian school of this place. This is not the first time that Indians have offered their services for the government. From the Revolutionary War until the present time, Indians have fought and died under the colors in every war. Yet today we have no place of honor in the pages of American history."

G. W. W., Weaver's Ford, N. C. The quotation, "Every tub must stand upon its own bottom," is from Part 1 of Pilgrim's Progress, by John Bunyan. It means that each of us must stand or fall on our own merits or demerits, and that we cannot claim credit for the merits of another. It is not a Scripture maxim.

E. L. L., Allentown, Pa. We are not to judge others, nor to condemn our neighbors rashly. There are many things that look bad which are yet capable of explanation. A Christian whose conscience is quickened can decide for himself whether it is right or not to do certain things. He knows, for instance, that he cannot reconcile ammunition-making, to kill people he never saw, with Christian character; nor can he reconcile dissipation, gambling, mere pleasure-seeking, or drunkenness, with his religious profession. But he should be careful of misjudging others. The world is too apt to be censorious, and we should not follow its example. When questions arise like those you mention in your letter, seek counsel of God and govern yourself according to the light you receive. If you believe in your heart that a thing is wrong, avoid it. As to judging others, do not let yourself be tempted to such a practice. God's mercy is boundless, and we have no ght. with our own narrow conception of his reat love and care, to attempt to fix the li s of his forgiveness.

L. M. S., Maryland. The name the new president of China is Li Yuan ing, pronounced Lee Yu-ahn Hoong. I the second name the accent is on the "an Li is the surname.

A. N. L., Pittston, Pa. Gambling, h ver we may look at it, is a demoralizing and ked practice. If one gambles on a chanc t is a fool's business, and if on a certaint hen it is dishonest. So many careers are w ked by gambling that the wisest thing for ent people to do is to let it severely alor not only for their own sakes, but for the e of the influence their example may ha on others. A little reflection should co ince any one that a young man's expert in gambling, betting, card-playing, etc., ould never be a recommendation for him any business or profession. People instin ely fight shy of the gambler.

W. S. H., Virginia. It is a mistake suppose that, because a person is a Christ , he or she must therefore be the foe of ever kind of amusement. There is "a time for erything," and you may depend upon it th the lugubrious individual who finds no in life himself and tries to persuade othe hat it is a very gloomy affair altogether. w l be the last one in the world to win othe o a religion which should flood the hear vith joy and peace. Your true Christia s a sunshine-bringer, not a frost. He is d iminating, however, in choosing his amuse nts. He knows that if he patronizes danc and bridge parties and a few others of th ame sort, he need not expect to have much, any, influence in prayer meeting, and th his example would be a bad one, especia for the younger folks. So he cuts those ings out, as belonging to the class he calls uestionable amusements," which do no harmonize with true Christian character.

H. M. H., Sardis, Tenn. The q tion raised in your letter is controversial, l to discuss it in the Mail-Bag would not b elpful to anyone. No one branch of the ristian Church has a monopoly of the uth. and all should labor in good fellowshi seeing that all serve one Lord and Mast and believe in the same Gospel. You may call how Paul, in his day, found the Chi ians of Corinth divided over the claims different leaders, and how he counseled em Give no heed to detractors. Stick to yo own historic and faithful denomination; an active and useful member of the chur and give God, not man, the glory.

A. The Foe Within the Gates

By
MARGARET WINTRINGER

JUST twenty years ago an American woman who had ventured to dine in a popular Parisian café without ordering wine was charged extra for her eccentricity, and, on account of her abstinence, was claimed as a convert to Mohammedanism by a member of the Turkish embassy dining at adjacent table.

This adventure led to the search for and discovery of a little café—the only one in all Paris—where wine was not sold; and so small and unknown was it that it seemed a mere rushlight in the encircling darkness of the universal wine-drinking customs of the French people.

The proprietor was a woman, and this was the beginning of a feminist temperance movement in France which forecasts a wineless nation.

This experience of twenty years ago was a large factor in my determination to pursue my temperance investigations in France. It required much logic and persuasion to secure the necessary vise of passport at the United States consulate in London, at a time when our diplomatic service had become a League for the Suppression of American Travel Abroad.

Before my arrangements were completed a young British army officer appeared at my hotel. In crossing the Channel his boat was chased by a submarine, attacked by a Zeppelin, and nearly wrecked by a floating mine. Surely an unpropitious time for travel! But that was not all.

PROPRIÉTÉ DE L'ÉTOILE BLEUE DU IXE
IMP PAUL DUPONT, PARIS.

This picture ("Alcohol leads to the court-martial") and the one below ("Absinthe is death") are reproductions of posters used in the campaign

There were other hindrances. The French consul refused to recognize my passport because the State Department's stamp upon the photograph which adorned it was a fraction of an inch out of plumb, and this necessitated several trips between New Broad Street and Bedford Square. Then came the Sussex disaster, which imposed further restrictions on travel.

At last I left Charing Cross station with a Cook's ticket and a passport which complied with all the regulations now demanded by a run from London to Paris. After standing two hours in line awaiting examinations and scrutiny of passports by British government officials, and giving conclusive proof that no British gold was secreted on our person, we were allowed to board the Arundell.

AT Newhaven occurred one of those dramatic incidents which disclose woman's pathetic part in the war. Few on board the train had noticed the shabbily dressed countrywoman who had never before traveled by rail, until at Newhaven the drooping, inconsequential little figure acquired tragic dignity.

Here the usual military officer met the train to ascertain if there were any relatives of wounded or dying soldiers aboard, en route to the front; and the bewildered, grief-stricken mother from the north of England answered that call.

London was new to her. Newhaven, with its struggling crowd of soldiers and travelers, frightened her, and she clung tightly to the arm of the officer. She would have gone to the boat immediately, but he piloted her to the station restaurant for a cup of tea. Cheered and warmed, the mother babbled of her boy's wonder when he should see her. The officer called a sweet-faced English nurse, who urged upon the woman a second and third cup of the cheering tea.

The mother rose to continue the journey that was to take her to her son. Then the cruel blow was given. The despairing cry of another Rachel was heard, and a poor crumpled little figure fell into the nurse's arms. There was no need to journey farther.

On board the Arundell tickets were exchanged for life-preservers, laughingly trailed on deck by passengers who were determined to make a jest of danger.

"If hanythink 'appens hall on this boat will go down," grumbled one of the deck hands as he pushed his way through the crowd. "We're not 'andin' hout life belts for playthings."

"Put on your life belts! Passengers refuse to wear them at their own risk," was the more dignified caution of one of the officers.

So they were donned by all. There were very stout passengers who needed two to meet their girth; and all too thin wearers whom the belts encircled nearly twice around. I awakened from a short nap in my steamer chair to find a group of English friends in life belts calmly drinking tea!

"Gracious, madame!" I was greeted by the stewardess as I walked into the ladies' cabin. "Madame wears not her life belt correct. If madame goes down madame's head will be under the water and her feet—they will be above the water!"

FRANCE is the surprise of the war. One hears little in France, but may see much. And I found a temperance movement there that presages as great a moral revolution as has taken place in Russia.

Before the war Marianne regarded her light wines as a safeguard against the repulsive drunkenness which shocks the sensibilities of travelers in some other European countries, and she saw no relation of cause and effect between the prevalence of wine and the increased consumption of absinthe. It had not occurred to her that her national problems—congenital disability, lowered birth rate, infant mortality, tuberculosis, the alarming growth of criminal violence whose increase for twenty years past has been in startling accord with the increased consumption of alcohol, were in any way attributable to her vineyards, wine-cellars, private stills and the universal drinking customs of her people. Even though it had cost her more in men and money than the present war, she had faced with but slight alarm an increase of thirteen hundred per cent. in the consumption of alcohol since 1870.

But with the concentration of a large number of men in military camps and warships, hospitals and munition factories, Marianne was rudely awakened to the fact that one million men a trifle less efficient through the moderate use of alcohol may prove a greater misfortune and expense to a nation than ten thousand rendered helplessly drunk!

In France, as everywhere in Europe, the beginning of war threw upon the screen of public consciousness a horrible phantasmagoria of drink. The private stills allowed by the government ran overtime, drunkenness increased, not only among the soldiery but among civilians and women. Young girls, whose inheritance of weakened will power from drunken fathers had destroyed moral resistance, fell a prey to and preyed upon the soldier.

The military hospitals were crowded with typhoid and other patients, whose disease-fighting white blood-cells had been impaired by the thirty thousand wine-shops of Paris.

During these crucial days temperance propaganda took a more drastic form. Pamphlets, books, and anti-alcoholic pictures were distributed in the Red Cross hospitals and in the homes of the soldiers and munition workers. Eminent scientists gave lectures on alcohol to sick and wounded soldiers in the hospitals. A series of meetings were held throughout Brittany and also in the munition centers, and these meetings were followed by the formation of anti-alcoholic groups. Temperance restaurants were opened where the clerk and the workman might get a full meal for fifty centimes, or ten cents.

The first temperance foyer for soldiers was started by a woman, Mlle. Babut. Even the lightest wines were barred; absolutely no alcoholic liquors were dispensed. Not a physician could be found willing to risk his professional reputation by espousing so radical a reform; but the women persisted, and Le Foyer des Soldats was opened.

It was not a mission, nor a charitable venture, but a place where Jean might come for recreation, rest, reading and comfort. If there were no wines, there was also no preaching—no warning mottoes moralized from the wall. Its attractive interior, gay music, good reading and clean games soon won Jean's favor.

And the light wines? The wisdom of the interdiction is best shown by the visit of a young soldier who ordered a cup of tea (which is gratuitous), two cups of coffee, two cups of chocolate, three glasses of buttermilk, a cup of cocoa, a bottle of sweet milk, and a final cup of tea.

The ladies arranged a table attractively, placed the beverages on it, and asked the young fellow to call his comrades.

"'Comrades!' he exclaimed; 'I gave that order for myself, and no one else shares it!'

"We clasped our hands in fear when he drained the last cup of chocolate," said Mlle. Wyer; "and when he arrived at the cocoa, we very much desired one doctor. I was so frightened when he took that last cup of tea! He did not mind at all, but we were seeck, seeck with apprehension. But," she added triumphantly, "you see, he would have had much alcohol within if we had served light wine, when he drank so much."

THE success of the venture led to the establishment of a second foyer at Bicêtre, "Le Vieux Poilu," which so lessened the patronage of the cafés that the mayor, who was also a wine merchant, dug up an old law forbidding the establishment of a canteen within a certain distance of a church or school, and ordered the foyer closed. But the women took the matter into court. All the papers favored the women, and two leading dailies published strong editorials in their behalf. The court ruled in favor of the women.

A third foyer was opened for the very young soldiers, and ere the year ended the government ordered commandants in charge of depots for stores to provide a sufficient quantity of non-alcoholic drinks for use in all government canteens.

The new campaign has not overlooked the children. In Paris one can see thousands of children marching in groups of fifty to social anti-alcohol centers, where they listen to excellent talks, often illustrated by magic lanterns, play games, and enjoy a frugal but appetizing lunch. Telling posters in conspicuous places illustrate the effects of alcohol. More than 200,000 signed cards have been sent to the Minister of Finance in the effort to take away from the peasant the "monstrous still which decimates the French more surely than the Germans."

L'Alcool est votre ennemi aussi redoutable que l'Allemagne...

Il a coûté à la France depuis 1870, en hommes et en argent, bien plus que la guerre actuelle.

L'Alcool flatte le palais; mais, véritable poison, il détruit l'organisme.

Les buveurs vieillissent vite. Ils perdent la moitié de leur vie normale et sont la proie facile d'infirmités et de maladies multiples.

Les "PETITS VERRES" des parents se transforment en GRANDES TARES héréditaires chez les descendants. La France leur doit environ deux cent mille fous, le double de poitrinaires, sans compter des goutteux, des ramollis avant l'âge et la plupart des criminels.

L'alcoolisme diminue des deux tiers notre production nationale, augmente la cherté de la vie et la misère.

A l'instar du Kaiser criminel, l'alcoolisme décime et ruine la France, à la plus grande joie de l'Allemagne.

Mères, jeunes gens, jeunes filles, épouses, agissez contre l'alcoolisme en souvenir des blessés et des morts glorieux pour la Patrie.

Vous accomplirez ainsi une tâche grandiose, égalant celle de nos héroïques soldats.

(Translation.) THE ALARM. French Society for Action Against Alcoholism. ¶Honorary President: M. Raymond Poincaré, President of the Republic. ¶To French Women and Young Frenchmen. (Under picture—What we have not been able to do, alcohol will do.)

Alcohol is your enemy, as formidable as Germany. ¶It has cost France, since 1870, in men and money much more than the present war. ¶Alcohol pleases the palate, but is a real poison that destroys the body. ¶Drinkers age rapidly. They waste half their normal life and fall easy prey to many infirmities and maladies. ¶The little glasses of the parents are transformed into hereditary defects in their descendants. ¶France owes to them about 200,000 insane, twice as many consumptives, without counting sufferers from gout and premature age, and most of our criminals. ¶Alcohol diminishes by two-thirds our national production, augments the cost of living, and increases poverty. ¶Like the criminal Kaiser, alcohol decimates and ruins France, to the great delight of Germany. ¶Mothers, young men, young girls, wives! Up and act against alcohol, remembering those who have gloriously died or suffered for the Fatherland! ¶You will thus accomplish a grand task, equalizing that of our heroic soldiers.

General Gallieni was the leader in the fight, which is popularly known in France as the "other war," with alcohol as the "interior enemy." Nor has the trade been inactive. It has built trenches long and deep of political power and vested interests. It has fought all military orders for the protection of the soldiers, with such unfair advantage that the stories of General Gallieni's threatened resignation were not mere gossip. The struggle has won the prohibition of the sale of absinthe; orders prohibiting the sale or gift of liquor to the soldiers in the entire war zone; extension of the prohibition to soldiers in the fortifications of Paris, and also to all communities where munitions of war are manufactured.

HOWEVER, in computing the victory we must remember that only those beverages come under prohibition which contain more than fifteen per cent. of alcohol; and enthusiasm is somewhat abated when we realize that, in a time when the very existence of the French nation depends upon the sobriety of its people, it required a year's struggle to win from the cabinet temperance legislation which simply forbids the sale of spirituous drinks and wines containing more than fifteen per cent. of alcohol to women, children and soldiers! And subsequent official circulars have weakened these orders.

But before the war such halting measures would have seemed to belong to the realm of dreams, so far in advance is it of any previous legislation, and manifesting such a radical change in French cust ms. The most hopeful phase is that this legislation as won through the cooperation of ten thousand diff nt societies, and that the number of persons who fav ed the measures exceeded two million.

With practically every man in France perfor ng his full measure of military service for his cou y, it follows naturally that the ten rance movement is largely a fem ist movement.

In fact, the poster "L'Alarme," sl vn here, illustrated by one of the ost famous artists in France, will be ng upon the walls of every post offi in France and in her colonies as we in town halls, schools and public squ es, so that it may reach the entire na on. Though issued by the French So ty for Action Against Alcohol, it is a niofficial government proclamation, aring the sanction of M. Raymond incaré.

IT is the women who have suf ed most cruelly through the war. he garb of the French widow has be me as familiar as the uniform of the ar nurse. One Sunday afternoon in ril, while sitting in a small park in ris, within two hours' time I counted ore than one thousand women cla in mourning. And the park was onl ne small corner of one section of a ity once the gayest in all the world. But I saw no selfish grief. The faces of ese women were alight with exalt on. They wore their weeds proudly, be use they attested the sacrifice they ad made, and the immolation of f her, husband, sons and brothers on the tar of country.

"I will do anything for my co try and everything against alcohol. I ave given one son to France, and the her is at the front; but France must dge us mothers that when our sons ave driven out the invading foe they hall not return to the menace of a g ter foe within—alcohol," said a m her whose mourning garb attested he ght to urge, with other mothers of F nce, the request that the government ose life has been saved through the ood of their sons shall repay the sacrif by assuring their immunity from the age of a greater enemy—alcohol.

And so a call was issued for a ass meeting of women at the Sorl ne, April 2. Four thousand wome responded. It was an audience the representative women of France. eneral Malleterre, the only man p ent, served as chairman. Amid gre enthusiasm, the Union of the Wom of France Against Alcohol was f ed. The officers of fourteen leading anizations of French women have sig an appeal which is being sent out the women of France. It is a mar ous document, issued in behalf of a m velous movement in France's most ical hour, and has already become hi ric. Who can read it without a thrill of miration for the patriotism of woma

The Partners

By IDA ALEXANDER

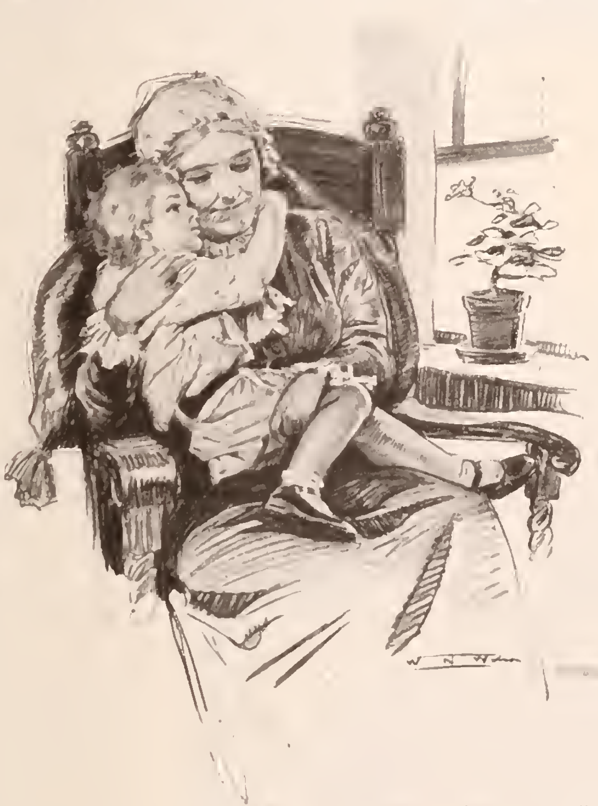
"MOTHER!" called Lottie, as soon as she opened the door. "Mother, where are you?"

Mrs. Stuart came hastily from the kitchen. "Here I am, dear," she said. "I've watched every minute till five minutes ago. What did the music teacher say?"

"Oh, everything that was encouraging and nice! He's certain that I shall succeed. It seems too good to be true. Mother, did you ever hear anything like it? I know I can get pupils right away."

Mrs. Stuart caressed the shining head that had found its way to her shoulder. "It is only what I expected," she said. "And I think that's what made me cry. It seems so strange for expectations to be realized!"

Lottie knew what her mother meant. Often it had been talked over before her, even when she was a little girl—the expectations of her father, which, somehow, never came true. Always he had been about to make a fortune; always he had failed.



The years had slipped away. He had turned from a lean brown father to a lean gray one. He stooped a little. He was altered in every way. All but the eyes. They were still two brown wells of hope. Lottie sighed a little, thinking of him. His face came before her as plainly as if he had been there in the flesh. He had been away a month. He was often away for months at a time, searching in the earth for carefully hidden treasures of gold.

At first Mrs. Stuart had hoped with him, believed in him. But that was long ago. After a while she had doubted secretly, and, later still, had disbelieved openly and without reserve. But she never had been able to dim his rainbow dreams. Each year he made a living wage, and little more. This year even that had not been forthcoming. And after two particularly distressful ventures, she pocketed her pride and eked out their income by sewing. The whirring of the sewing-machine often awakened Lottie, often lulled her to sleep at night. She had pleaded unavailingly to help.

"No! No! No!" her mother protested. "I won't have it, Lottie. Keep on with your music. There is nothing I desire so much as your success. I'm so tired of—failure!"

And then Lottie knew that her mother's thoughts of the father were becoming tinged with bitterness. The daughter did not resent it. In justice she could not resent it. But neither did she share it. And she longed for his success far more than for her own. She added her longing to her prayer at night, clothed in the language of the day: "Dear God, please let father make good!"

THEIR letters to the father told of the happy secret. His letters hinted of a speedy home coming. Lottie procured music pupils and set to work with a will. Often after an afternoon spent with her pupils, Lottie's piano kept time with her mother's sewing-machine far into the night. The money, too, instead of being put away for the necessary lessons, followed in the way of the sewing-money.

Then Mr. Stuart's return was put off indefinite. "I'm working on what promises to be a big thing," he wrote, "and I don't want to come home until I'm sure."

But just when the fear had begun to seize them that something had gone terribly wrong with him, so long did he remain silent, he walked in on them. After they had kissed him and cried over him, he made the great announcement.

"Mother, I've struck it! I've found gold. The place is rich with it. I know enough to know that. I stumbled on it in the strangest way, when I was about out of heart and ready to give up. I knew how hard I had made things at home, how different they should have been. I had almost lost all hope. There was every indication that gold was there. But day after day passed and none came to view. It came over me suddenly that it would be better to give it up, once for all, and start for home. But the miner's nature cried out for one more day! I began without much hope. I worked an hour or so, then—a turn of the pick and it lay before me—gold and gold and gold! I cried—the relief was so great. And now, mother, a little while and all your worries will be over. This strike promises to provide anything in reason—out of reason, for that matter. What do you say?"

But the relief had been to Mrs. Stuart what it had been to him. And she was crying quietly, her head on his shoulder. But after a moment she smiled at him.

"Lottie can have her lessons now," she said.

AFTER Lottie had gone to bed, the father and mother sat talking over the present and the future. "I can hardly believe it," she said. "Are you sure, sure, sure, Ansel? The disappointment would be hard!"

"Yes," he answered, "I am sure. I made sure before I came away. And I covered my tracks so that no one else can find the place. It's wildcat property, anyway. No one will be apt to be near there. It was just by chance that I was, just by chance that I stayed. When I think how nearly I missed it——"

Mrs. Stuart squeezed his hand in both of her own. "There was never a time like now for finding it. Is it government land?"

"No," he answered, "that's the only thing that has troubled me. The man who owns it is a rich old man. He lives in Sonora. But people generally allow a claim to be worked—on shares, of course. But this is so rich——"

"GRAN'MUVVER"

By W. Livingston Larned

WHEN little hearts are full of ache, and all the world is gray;
One haven reaches out to them to kiss the tears away;
One pair of arms is always wide to take the wayward in;
One room in all the lonely house is where the smiles begin.
And like a little sacred shrine, far from the hurt and pain,
Gran'muvver's rocking-chair awaits to make Youth smile again.

"There, there, don't cry,"
I hear her whisper softly in his ear;
"Grandmother loves her little boy
'Twill all come right, my dear."

When little men are spanked and sent, eyes-brimming, off to bed,
And lips are parched and brow is hot, and there's a splitting head;
When, somehow, Mother seems to want to lose her Soljer Boy,
Because he ate an extra sweet or stumbled on a toy,
Then, then Gran'muvver's Room is best; Gran'muvver's sympathy
Puts back the love and sunshine where they always used to be.

"There, there, don't cry."
I hear her, in the shadows say, to him,
"Grandmother loves her little boy"—
And her eyes, too, are dim.

When little storms blow up from skies that yesterday were fair,
And griefs as poignant as a blade are extra hard to bear:
When Daddy doesn't hug his son, nor take him "pick-a-back,"
Nor pat his curly, golden head, nor care at all, alack!
And, very much alone, a boy runs sobbing for relief,
Then Gran'mas prove themselves, I guess, as antidote for grief.

"There, there, don't cry,"
We hear her, but her own voice trembles, too,
"Grandmother loves her little boy,
"'Twill all come right with you."

Mrs. Stuart's mild eyes lit with the fierceness of a wild thing of the forest; a mother protecting her young.

"You must buy it!" she cried. "Whatever it costs, you must buy it. Ansel, you must not let this chance follow the others. You must buy!"

"But we have no money."

"We'll raise it somehow. This opportunity must not be thrown away. We must secure the land—buy it. It's the only way. Don't run the risk of offering to work on shares. Don't mention that there's gold there. You know what people are. You know what my life has been. Now I'm tired. I want our chance—for Lottie's sake."

"You shall have it, mother," he assured her. "I know, at least I'm pretty sure, he'll sell. But what of my anxiety to buy—property like that? It's a gold country. He'll know what I want it for. Don't you think it would be better to tell him?"

"No!" she cried. "No, a hundred times no! Don't let him suspect. Ansel, I won't stand it this time. I've reached the breaking point. This one time you must go my way. I want my girl to have what I've never had. Her whole future is at stake. When I think of her, so talented, so patient, so dear, I feel that I could dig the gold with my bare hands!"

"I know, I know," said the father. "I've felt the same way always, about both of you. You cannot want her to have it more than I do. I just want to be certain."

"You're certain to lose it," she said, "if you tell him what you want it for. We can't do that. There must be a way."

Her eyes narrowed as she thought it over. Sharp anxiety lay over her face like a mask. In the silence Mr. Stuart watched her as she puzzled it out. And suddenly light broke on her.

"Angora goats!" she cried. "Say you want it for raising Angora goats. Paulson bought up wild land for that, you know, year before last. And you can buy a few, so that it will be the truth. Wouldn't that answer, Ansel? Couldn't a person want to buy the land for that?"

"Yes," he answered. "Yes, I think so. There's lots of grazing land and plenty of water on the place."

"Then say that, Ansel. Promise me that you will."

It was a moment before he spoke. And then he brought forth the words solemnly, like a vow.

"I will," he said.

WHEN Stuart at last got back to the scene of his find, he went directly to the little cabin on the place. "I won't go to see Armstrong until to-morrow night," he thought to himself. "I'd rather walk the seven miles to Sonora than face him in the day."

The first peep of dawn awoke him. After a cup of coffee, he went directly to the place. No one had been there. He worked all day, finding evidences of even greater richness than he had at first supposed. His heart beat high with thankfulness and hope.

But something of his elation was dimmed as he took the trail to Sonora. He climbed the mountains with a lagging step. He sighed when the lights of the town came into view. But still he kept on. Presently he found himself before the very house.

Mr. Armstrong lived alone, except for the servants. A visitor, even though a stranger, was a pleasure. He welcomed Stuart cordially. Stuart hastened to introduce the subject. The old man looked at him curiously.

"What do you want that old land for?" he asked. "I've been paying taxes on it for twenty years. There's no ore there. It's just waste land. What on earth do you want it for?"

"For raising Angora goats," affirmed Mr. Stuart, like a child repeating a lesson.

"Oh, I see. Yes, it would be good for that, I suppose. There's good springs there and feed. But is there money in it? Why do you want to start that?"

"Because I must make money. I've been kind of a failure."

Words came easier now. He found himself blurting out the story of Lottie's music and all to an interested and kindly listener. The old man nodded his head when he paused.

"I had a struggle myself," he said, "before I made money. I was older than you before I 'won out,' as the young folks call it. Now, I'm going to make you the very best figure on that land that I can. And I wish you all luck."

ANSEL STUART started back over the mountains. The money was gone from his pocket. In its place was a signed paper, giving credit for this first payment on his land—his land!

He was tired when he reached the cabin once more. But he did not fall asleep as he had done the preceding night. He lay long staring out at the darkness with hopeless eyes. The eagerness, the youthfulness, were gone from them. Suddenly they had become old, like the man himself.

He babbled to himself, as the night wore away, in broken thoughts of this or that. "She said I carried their lives in my hand. If only he hadn't been so kind! They've never had what they should have had—and Lottie's music—my poor little girl! No wonder her mother wouldn't forgive me, if I took that away! Their lives in my hand! God knows it's hard. I wonder if he knows just how hard. But a man must do what he has to do. A man must stand or fall by what he thinks is right. What's in him must come out, win or lose."

It was with this thought he finally slept. It was with it he rose up in the morning. He took his way over the mountains again, his feet planted firmly, his eyes with their wonted light of one who has looked only upon what is good. He walked quickly. It was only when he again stood before Mr. Armstrong's door that he hesitated, like one who would avoid a hateful task.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

REV. DR. BLISS DIES IN BEIRUT. The whole Christian Church received with sorrow news of the death of Rev. Dr. Daniel Bliss, the founder and guiding spirit of the Syrian Protestant College, Beirut, Syria, which occurred July 28 at his home there. Dr. Bliss had reached his ninety-third year and for over sixty years had been a missionary in Syria. He was born in Georgia, Vt., and eventually entered the Congregational ministry and went to Syria with his wife, who was Miss Abby M. Wood, of Amherst, Mass. It was during the Civil War that Dr. Bliss returned to this country and raised money to begin an endowment of the educational institution in Beirut which has made for itself so great a place of influence. The Syrian Protestant College was started by Dr. Bliss in a rented house, with a handful of pupils. The cornerstone of the principal building was laid in 1873. Dr. Bliss continued as president until 1902, when he retired and became president emeritus, which office he held at his death. Meanwhile the college had grown until fifteen buildings are required for its activities, and its staff of seventy-five or more teachers has under its care nearly a thousand students, who include Turks, Syrians, Egyptians and Armenians, as well as the children in the missionaries' families. It was in the Syrian Protestant College that thousands of both Christians and Moslems took refuge when the Italians bombarded Beirut in 1912. The college compound was the one place of security during that distressing incident. The venerable head who has now left the scene of his labors was one of the first, if not indeed the first, to see the ultimate possibilities in Christian educational work in the Orient, and today there are 450 schools under the direction of the American Board in the land of the Moslems. Millions of dollars have been invested in making these institutions the principal civilizing influence among these ancient races of Mesopotamia and Syria and the Far East. The whole Christian Church will do homage to the memory of Dr. Bliss, that great pioneer in this splendid work.

HISTORIC PORTRAITS OF THE OTHER FELLOW. It having been shown that one of the portraits of the signers of the Declaration of Independence in Independence Hall in Philadelphia was really a portrait of the brother of the original signer and that some doubt is admissible as to the validity of other portraits, it is proposed that all the portraits be replaced by bronze tablets.

FIGHTING THE WHITE PLAGUE. More than 3.000 agencies are now engaged in the nation-wide fight against tuberculosis. Among the 3,000 are 550 sanitariums and hospitals, 455 dispensaries, 310 open-air schools, and 1,324 anti-tuberculosis associations and committees.

PENSIONS TO REWARD FAITHFULNESS. After studying the subject for six years, and at the same time accumulating a fund of $2,000,000 for their purpose, Swift & Company of Chicago have announced to their employees a pension plan that ultimately will involve an outlay of some $400,000 a year above the income from the fund, by which all employees of that company and other concerns absorbed by it in the past are sure of a pension running from $240 to $5,000 a year according to circumstances, after a service of twenty-five years, or, in certain specified cases, fifteen years; the widows and children of eligible employees receive one-half of the amount to which the employee shall be entitled at the time of his death. A pension board composed of five members, officers and employees of Swift & Company, and appointed annually by a board of directors, will administer the fund. The employees themselves do not contribute to this fund, which is made available solely on the condition of efficient work and continuous service.

IF IT WERE NOT FOR THE IF. Russia still allows the manufacture and sale of beers and wines; France has forbidden only absinthe; but the Norway Parliament was considering the passage of a measure for total prohibition, when a nation-wide strike occurred. The legislation was thereupon rushed through, but was made temporary for the duration of the strike. There is likelihood, however, that it will be made permanent, and that Norway will have the honor of being the first prohibition nation in the world.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE Isonzo River front of the Austro-Italian battle line has been the scene of the most interesting and important events in the European war during the week August 5-11.

The Isonzo River flows about north and south from the extreme northern end of the Adriatic, and topographically, though not actually, as the Austrian territory runs at places a little to the west of it, forms the boundary between Austria and Italy. To the southeast of this river and about thirty miles therefrom is the city of Trieste, the chief Austrian seaport, whose possession has long been desired by the Italians.

When the war broke out between Italy and Austria the Italians immediately drove the Austrians out of Austrian territory to the west of the Isonzo, but were halted in their advance at the line of the river itself, and from time to time during the past year have launched offensives of more or less strength against the Austrian line along the stream, but have always been repulsed.

The line of defense began at the important fortress of Monfalcone in the south near the shores of the Adriatic, and centered in the strongly placed and well-fortified city of Gorizia, some twenty miles to the north. Some months ago the Italians after prodigious efforts succeeded in rendering themselves masters of Monfalcone, but were thereafter unable to break the line north of this town at any point and thus make the possession of Monfalcone of strategical value, permitting them to advance southeastwardly to Trieste, since to do this in safety the possession of the northern part of this line was absolutely essential.

In this position the situation rested for several months. After the quiet concentration of large forces at a point opposite Gorizia, the center of this front, the Italians on Monday, August 7, began a formidable assault at this point. For two days a fierce battle raged, both sides displaying the utmost bravery and tenacity, and finally late Tuesday evening the Italians succeeded in carrying completely the Austrian positions at the bridgehead of Gorizia, and, following up their advantage energetically the next day after violent hand-to-hand fighting in the streets of the town itself, rendered themselves masters thereof. This is without doubt the most important thing the Italians have accomplished so far in the war. The town, many thousand Austrian prisoners, besides a large quantity of artillery, stores, etc., fell into their hands, and, more important still, they occupied a strategic point that completely breaks the Austrian resistance on the northern Isonzo ine and forces the Austrians to fall ba to their second line of defense alon the Wippach River; and this is a real s in advance in the campaign against Tr te.

This Austrian second line is a s ong one. East to west, a few miles uth of Gorizia, runs the River Wippach, ong whose southern bank, beginning i the 4,000-foot Brinbauer, near Adels rg. on its eastern end, runs a ran of mountains averaging over 2,000 f in height, all the way to Gradisca, o the Isonzo; this range and the roads ading through it form a natural ba ier, to which have been added fortifica ns, making as strong a line of defer as the Isonzo.

Through the center of this co try a railroad runs south to Trieste, onnecting with a line to Taibach an the north and east, so that communic ons are both speedy and easy. To eak through here will necessitate at ast as great an effort on the part the Italians as their effort to ca ure Gorizia, which has, after a year ulminated in success.

On the South Tyrol portion the Austro-Italian front there was con lerable hard fighting during the we at points of local advantage, but th nal result was to leave the general po ion much as it was at the opening the week. It seems probable that a result of their Gorizia victory th talians will make a special effort o his South Tyrol front during the c ing week to drive the Austrians from I ian soil.

fered with by bad weather, which made the ground so soft that the artillery could not be maneuvered. Friday's fighting (August 4) on the north Verdun front was probably as fierce and as desperate a combat as has been seen so far in this war, in proportion to the number of men engaged. Twice in twelve hours the French, with valiant efforts and almost superhuman energy, took possession of Thiaumont fort, while the Teutons with undiminished courage tried unsuccessfully to wrest it from their hands.

On Saturday Thiaumont fort and the village of Fleury were won and lost several times, but the accounts are so confused that it is impossible to give any detailed statements of the ebb and flow of the fierce combat. Suffice it, therefore, to say that eventually during Saturday night the Germans reoccupied Thiaumont fort, while Fleury was divided between the combatants.

Sunday and Monday were quiet. During Monday night, however, the French recaptured Thiaumont fort, and another hard battle began in this region, lasting all day Tuesday and ending Tuesday night with the Germans again possessing themselves of Thiaumont fort. There was also hard but resultless fighting in Fleury. On Wednesday infantry fighting stopped, but a violent artillery combat broke out along the whole front, which continued all day, that night and into Thursday.

The Picardy portion of the western front was nothing like as active this week as last. Friday and Saturday on the British portion of the front were quiet days, only minor fighting taking place. On Sunday morning the Australians made a small advance northeast of Pozières and held the ground gained against strong German counter-attacks. These counter-attacks continued on Monday, and a local fight ensued in which the lines swayed to and fro continuously, finally settling down to their original positions.

On Tuesday the Germans attacked on the whole line from Thiepval to Bazentin-le-Petit, and gained some ground; while the British recaptured some ground previously lost to the west of Guillemont, further to the southeast. Next day the Australians won back some of the ground the Germans had taken the day before. Bad weather interfered with operations for the next two days.

Farther south, the French made an unsuccessful attack on the German position north of Monacu farm. On Sunday in a local fight near Estrées, the French took three or four hundred yards of the enemy's trenches, and on Tuesday, after a hard fight, took the German positions north of the Somme from Hem wood to the river, and considerably extended their successes in this region.

Friday, August 4, the Turks in considerable force began an attack on the British line defending the Suez Canal on a line extending from Tina Bay to Katia, and the British reported that a veritable battle had taken place on Saturday, which had, however, been won by them, and their enemy forced to retreat with heavy casualties, besides 3,500 prisoners lost.

This appears to have been the most formidable attack on the canal yet made and is possibly the precursor of another still more deadly, for the reason that the Turks would hardly have delivered their main attack on greatly superior forces in fortified positions with so comparatively small a force as 14,000 men, so that this affair seems more likely to have been a reconnaissance in force than the main attack.

One very great difficulty with which the Turks have had to grapple heretofore in their efforts against the canal is the almost absolute lack of water in the country north of it, which for many miles is a pure sand desert. Under this desert, near the Mediterranean, water exists and for months past Teutonic engineers have been at work digging for it. The occurrence of this offensive indicates that some progress at least has been made in this quest.

On the eastern front, from Riga to south of the Pripet marshes, while there were isolated skirmishes at various points there was no important fighting. Farther south, on the line of the Stochod River and west of Lutsk, the Teutons are a little more than holding their own, and the Russians, though attacking strongly, have been uniformly repulsed.

The Russians on the Sereth River, in northeastern Galicia, and to the south of Brody, have also made no progress, while at points the Teutons have been able to advance slightly.

Still farther south, in eastern Galicia, between the Dniester and Pruth Rivers, the Russians have bored their way steadily westward, and at the end of the week are reported to have taken Stanislau, a very important railroad center. This capture will be invaluable to them in their attempt on Lemberg, provided that they are able to supplement it by taking Haliez, a few miles farther north, and cross the Dniester.

In southern Bukowina the Teutons have slightly improved their positions. In the Caucasus the Turks continue their successes and have recaptured the fortified towns of Mush and Bitlis.

Still There Is No Place Like Home. That acquaintanceships between girls and their men friends should in every case be cultivated chiefly in the atmosphere of the girl's home has been again emphasized by the arrest in New York of the "king of the white slave trust," who, if he is to be believed, had found it comparatively easy, by the aid of outwardly decent young fellows, to lure away from all possible parental help some 3,000 schoolgirls. From such fearful instances as this parents everywhere should take warning.

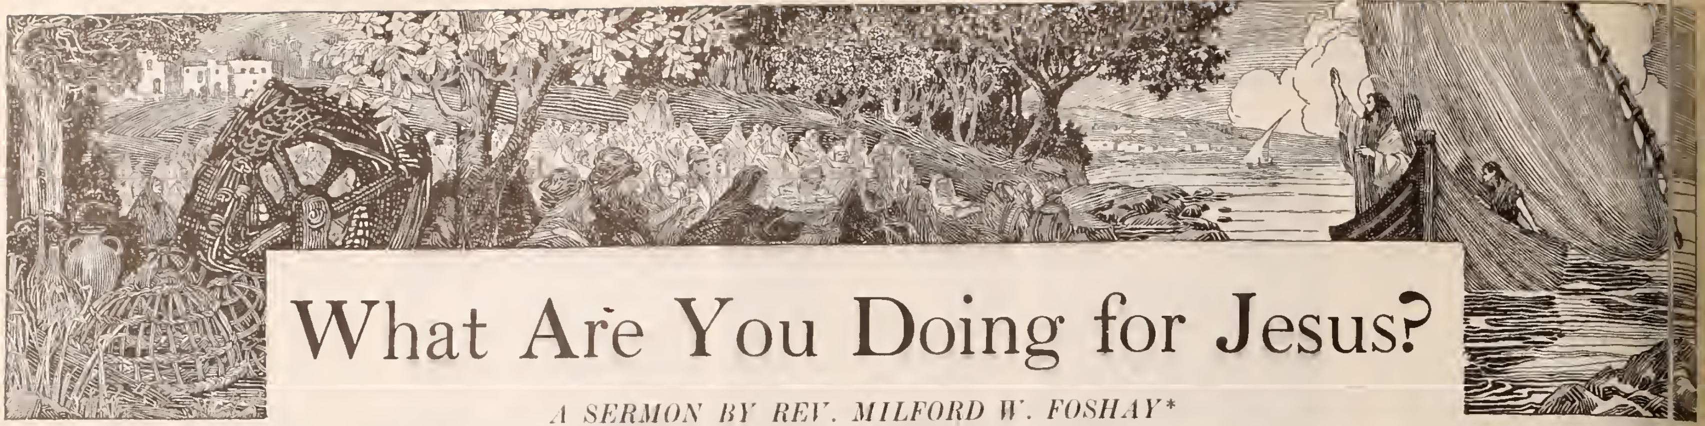
The Political Situation. There is still but one bona fide big party presidential nominee in the field, as President Wilson has not yet signified his acceptance of the Democratic nomination, though it is the current belief that he will decide to do so. In fact, it is understood that he is working on his speech of acceptance, which is warranted not to leave Candidate Hughes a leg to stand on. Mr. Hughes is touring the country—we will not say in what make of automobile—and is turning the merciless light of publicity, intensified by a highly polished Republican lens, full upon the Administration in Washington. We had ourselves expected that everything was not right at Washington, but are aghast at what is now disclosed. However, the Administration states that it is not true, any of it. But it certainly is fortunate for the country that once in every four years we have an opportunity to turn one set of rascals out and let another set—or, that is to say, it's an ill wind that blows nobody good.

Fighting the Infantile Paralysis Epidemic. It may seem an unkind thing to say, but the probability is that when the plague of infantile paralysis is finally stamped out, the country will be solemnly warned that its safety from such visitations depends upon the establishment of Federal, state and municipal medical bodies with police power to visit, examine and prescribe for every individual. And yet this dreadful situation in New York and vicinity presents the disconcerting spectacle of the helplessness of the ablest medical experts to say from whence comes this disease and how it can be instantly detected and frustrated in its attacks upon little children. Who, then, will compose these medico-police boards? The disease is still spreading, invading new states, keeping the health authorities of every town and county on pins and needles with apprehension, and threatening to prevent the opening of the schools, certainly in New York City, which would also imply the closing of Sunday schools and exclusion of children from every place of public assembly and all vehicles of public travel. Total number of cases reported to the New York City Board of Health is now well over 6,000, and the total number of deaths close to 1,500. Accurate tabulations of cases outside of New York are not available, but the number is increasing.

Might Arbitrate as to Whether They Are Dying. The Turkish government still holds out in its refusal to permit relief work by neutral committees in Syria among the many thousands of native Christians who are reported to be starving, on the ground that crops in that region are better than anywhere else in the empire, and that no serious famine exists. It is reassuring to learn that if there is a famine in Syria, it is not serious; probably merely deprives the inhabitants of food. However, efforts by the American government to persuade Turkey to admit American relief have not been abandoned.

Famous American Surgeon Dies. Dr. John B. Murphy of Chicago died at Mackinac Island, Michigan, August 11, of heart disease at the age of fifty-eight. Dr. Murphy is looked upon as the founder of the present advanced system of intestinal surgery. He has held the highest positions in the gift of the surgical and medical professions in this country. Dr. Murphy was recently knighted by Pope Benedict because of his contributions to surgery.

Walking Threatens the Nation. Although for the moment New York City has escaped the vast inconvenience of a street railway strike, the operators and the workmen having compromised their differences, a strike on an almost nation-wide scale is threatened by the four great railroad men's brotherhoods, involving some 400,000 employees on 225 railroads. The Big Four, as they are known, are the Brotherhoods of Locomotive Engineers, Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Railroad Train Men, and the Order of Railway Conductors of America. These organizations, by the way, and the Bricklayers', Masons' and Plasterers' International, are not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The companies have been for several months preparing for the clash with their employees which began August 10 before the United States Board of Mediation, when the demands of the men formulated last March for an eight-hour working day and time and a half for overtime, with other concessions, were investigated. The heads of the brotherhoods and about 600 chairmen of local unions assembled in New York to conduct the negotiations. The upshot of a great deal of discussion was a proposal by the Federal mediators that the differences be submitted to arbitration. The men showed unwillingness to arbitrate, and thereupon President Wilson issued an invitation, almost peremptory in tone, to the representatives of both sides to confer with him at Washington. Without making predictions, it may be said that the outlook for an adjustment is fair.



What Are You Doing for Jesus?

*A SERMON BY REV. MILFORD W. FOSHAY

TEXT—Titus 2:10. "That they may adorn the doctrine of God our Savior in all things."

WHEN a cloud received their ascending Lord out of the sight of his disciples, he sent a heavenly messenger to give them the expectation of again seeing him "come in like manner as ye beheld him going into heaven." It would be a long period between the two appearances, and, meantime, were they and those who have come after them to be the only expectant ones? In the twelfth and thirteenth verses of the tenth chapter of Hebrews we learn that "he [Jesus] sat down on the right hand of God; henceforth expecting till his enemies be made the footstool of his feet." Our Lord, then, during this long wait, is expecting a great many things from us in bringing about the consummation of his plans, his return to those who look for him. What are some of these things?

He has the right to expect honor and acknowledgment. But there are different ways of rendering these tributes. We often do so carelessly, without real thought of the reason for it. This is not an acceptable way to make an offering to our expectant Lord. Why do we honor any position, as that of a president? Any position is honorable if it serves usefully, and the degree of honor increases with the increase of the number so served. This is true even in the humbler avenues of activity. The establishment of a certain merchant has the most honorable mention of any in town, because it serves the largest number acceptably. But he does this for selfish purposes! This does not vitiate the principle involved, for the patronage is continued because the best service in town is rendered. If we can add to this a personal esteem for the merchant, the honor is of course increased. We honor the position of President, even when the incumbent has shown that he is not fit to fill it; but how much greater the honor when the position is worthily filled!

THE character of God insures the worthiness of him whom we worship, yet how increasingly we love to honor him as we more and more enter into a conception of what he has done for us! He expects us to recognize his Saviourhood, and then, as those within the family of believers, to honor and reverence him. Thought of the reason why we give honor to the Lord is thus a means of increasing our reverence. And this is healthful, as a lack of reverence is injurious. We can get only what we give in this respect. "Them that honor me I will honor." Jesus is expecting honor from us, not as a servant honors his lord, but as a friend honors his Saviour. Rendered this way, the world sees that we feel it.

Out of this develops the love which our Lord expects us to possess and show to the world. But while Jesus expects love from us, are we really responsible for its possession? Is it not something which comes upon us without our volition? Yes, and yet combustion never yet took place where there was nothing to create ignition. It is the recognition of that infinite service of his Saviourhood, the acknowledgment of him and the contemplation of what the salvation is which he has accomplished for us, that kindles into flame the love which continues to act as a principle of service in us. "We love him because he first loved us."

In the exercise of this love our Lord expects us to become more and more like him. The purpose of the Father in sending forth the Son was that humanity might get back what it had lost. "For whom he foreknew, he also foreordained to be conformed to the image of his Son. . . ." This agrees with the expression of the ultimate desire Jesus had for his disciples, as shown by that wonderful revelation of his purpose disclosed in the seventeenth chapter of John: "And the glory which thou hast given me I have given unto them; that they may be one even as we are one; I in them and thou in me, that they may be perfected into one; that the world may know that thou didst send me, and lovedst them, even as thou lovedst me."

NOW, we find the manifestation of Jesus' love for the Father in what he was and what he did. His love was not merely a sentiment to be spoken of, but a principle to be worked out. His words were confirmed by his deeds. It is not enough for us to confess him before the world. We cannot sufficiently show in that way "that the world may know that thou didst send me"; but his "Go thou and do likewise" must be so put into practice as to prove to the world that, like him, we are going about doing good. This is love in the concrete, and it produces a result which the Lord has a right to expect from us: "That all may honor the Son, even as they honor the Father."

This is the urge which produces missionary effort. It is the force within which enables us to put an arm around the outcast while telling him the way of redemption. It is the overflowing of a stream which leads us to cast bread upon the waters. It is the source of that great expectation, "the blessed hope and appearing of the great God and our Saviour, Jesus Christ."

THE MOTHERS

By Martha Haskell Clark

ALL night the feeble plaint had never ceased,
The tiny clutching hands had found no rest,
Till wan and gray the slowly-paling east
Touched dim the baby face upon my breast.

"Dear God," I said, "oh, teach me how to pray!
Through easy paths my faith has loitered slow;
No words have I, I know not what to say,
Save this alone—O God, I love him so!"

A hand was sudden laid upon my hand;
A woman's eyes looked pitying at me;
A gray-haired form stood close—"I understand.
I was a mother too, in Galilee.

"Across the sunny Galilean sea
I heard the rumored power of Jesus' name,
I laid my dying child upon his knee . . .
I trusted him—canst thou not do the same?"

The whisper ceased, and through the blinds astart
The first soft rays of morning sunlight crept.
Warm-breathing, gathered close against my heart,
My child stretched drowsy limbs, and smiling, slept.

For our Lord is expecting that we shall prepare the world for his coming. Are we "looking for and earnestly desiring [hastening] the coming of the day of God?" For this he said, "Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations, . . ." and "beginning at Jerusalem." It is at this future time that his enemies are to be made the "footstool of his feet." Doubtless he had in mind as an illustration of his ultimate triumph the practice of conquerors in putting a foot upon the neck of an enemy. The enemies to whom he will do this are Satan and Death. He is expecting us to contribute to this victorious consummation in various ways, especially in three direct lines of activity.

BY personal preparedness. Whatever our views may be of civic duty in governmental preparedness for European invasion, we know that Satan is in perpetual attack upon a holy life, and we need to be prepared to resist him day by day. Never a let-up. "And what I say unto you I say unto all, Watch!" Surely we need to pray, "Give us this day our daily bread." And what a question this is for us to answer: "Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" Yet he is expecting us to be ready. "Blessed is that servant whom his lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing." "And they that were ready went in with him." It is no light thing to make the preparation the Lord expects of us: "Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin." The word "blood" here represents life. Life is involved in the issue, and the life received by preparedness is conformation to the image of our Lord. "We shall be like him."

Then he expects us to assist others in becoming prepared for the final outcome of our earthly existence. It has been pointed out so frequently that it has become trite to speak about the Gospel method being the acceptance of Christ on the part of the individual, then his turning to his family, as Andrew "first findeth his own brother Simon," and then the Gospel spread locally in Jerusalem, widening out until it takes in the whole earth. But there are some things which, because of their very familiarity, need stirring up. And this is one of them: What part are we playing in keeping our local church and community in that state of spiritual preparedness expected by our rd? The effort to do this must be constant and ins ent. There are those within reach of our personal inf nce who have not yet accepted the Saviourhood our Lord in an individual rather than a general wa . It is our privilege to lead such to him. Then the are the children growing up, who must be taugl the grand truths of the Bible, that they too may cc e to know the Lord. He expects us to do this, and hile the responsibility is great, much greater is the pr lege of assisting a steady stream of precious humai ouls to flow into the river of our God. And it is o by individual preparedness that we are competen hus to sustain and augment the results of the Gospel here we live.

What our individual spiritual life is to local spel power, the spiritual strength of the church wil e to the world-wide spread of a knowledge of the S our. And our Lord is expecting nothing less tha this from us. The good news of his sacrificial li and death for the whole world, proclaimed wl ever there are human beings, is the only way to ma his enemies the footstool of his feet. This is the neficent victory of the world-conqueror, Love. This alone brings the release of the captive, the deliv ance of "them who through fear of death were al heir lifetime subject to bondage." And this b ause "perfect love casteth out fear."

IT is easy at this stage of our thought to i gine the glorious consummation of the age, whe esus shall have entered upon his reign. It is, p aps, the natural way to conclude the various tru s we have been considering. But the easiest way do a thing is not always the best way. Nor is t way provided by the technique of construction vays the most forceful way to conclude a discourse. Conditions which our Lord expects us to bring bout have been treated, and rather than contempl the glorious results ensuing when these shall hav been accomplished, we gather them all together the concluding statement that Jesus expects th implicit obedience from us which alone can bri to a successful termination his introduction of the ingdom of Heaven on earth. To get this firmly i our consciousness is much more likely to bring pass the things desired than to effervesce about ture glory.

What Jesus has set his disciples to do is the dest task ever imposed on man. Without his lea ship it would never be accomplished. With it, i s assured, yet only through our absolute obedi e to his directions. "If ye love me, keep my con andments." "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and not the things that I say?" We may render ob ence to the government, or any power, because fear to do otherwise. At the same time, the on obedience which can be fully trusted is the one wing out of a recognition of the beneficence of the wer. The patriot obeys the law from an altogetl different motive than the anarchist. So, when w learn to love the Lawgiver of our life, obedience him becomes an impulsive act. It requires this co ition in us in order to resist the seductive approache f the enemy who is to be overcome—Satan, whose ivity is exercised to get us to break the law of righte ness, which we call sinning—"sin is the transg ssion [breaking] of the law."

Instantly, now, we see that disobedience is itorous. It is rebellion. And, with this realizat , we shrink from it, because it will hurt the One v have learned to love, and it will destroy the pos bility of that glorious ending we look forward to. Obedience to the will of our Lord is the concrete su ming up in effect of all he is expecting us to do. T contrast between this and disobedience is vivi se forth in the final result: "at the revelation of tl Lor Jesus from heaven with the angels of his p er i flaming fire, rendering vengeance to them . . tha obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus, . . wh shall suffer eternal destruction from the face f th Lord and from the glory of his might, wheu sha come to be glorified in his saints. . . ."

Obedience, glory; disobedience, destructi l not this the most important thought which n re main with us, to the end that we fulfil the ishe of our expectant Lord? Obedience is the tru tes of love, human or divine, that can be given. n ou divine relationships how are we showing it?

The Pedantic Conscience

SUNDAY, August 27. Luke 11 : 42. "Ye tithe mint and rue and all manner of herbs, and pass over judgment and the love of God." It is possible to overlook large ends in our obtrusive e for small ones. It sometimes happens that we e not see the wood for the trees. A man may be so i nt upon a tombstone that he cannot see the c rch. He may be so absorbed in ecclesiastical m hinery that he overlooks eternal truth. He can fi his eyes upon his boots and never have a glimpse o he mountains. He can be so engaged with mint a rue that he never catches sight of God's righteousn s, which is "like the great mountains," and of G 's judgments, which are "like the great deep." Al all this breeds an extraordinary delusion: we c e to think that tithing mint and rue is more vital th n reflecting the life and love of God. The lesser th g begins to satisfy the soul which was intended t find its bread in the infinite. A sprig of mint supp ts the tree of life.

ow, this delusion seizes upon the soul with great s tlety. It hides itself behind apparent patches of g e. It inclines a man who has violated the holy la of rectitude to find a soothing consolation in c rities. The man who gives unfair wages seeks s faction in building a row of almshouses. The jerry-b der who just throws his houses together, makes a ement for the flimsy structure by putting in a p ty wall-paper and plenty of electric bells. We find d ght in a trifling conscientiousness while the big n ssities are overlooked. We live and love in little b ways of truth and virtue and not in the great h ways of the broad commandments of God.

he smaller things are purposed by our God to be t adjuncts of the bigger things: better still, they are p posed to be their fruits and not their substitutes. O holiness is to be the explanation of our tithes. O love is to be the fountain of our beneficence. The lo of Christ is to constrain us! We are to pass from t big things to the smaller things, from the great W te Throne to our social courtesies, and from C ary to our beneficence. Everything is to have the s of the Highest. "We love because He first lo d." We are to tithe our very mint and rue beca e he gave himself for us. J. H. J.

he Strength that Comes Through Prayer

MONDAY, August 28. Gen. 32 : 22-32. "Jacob asked him and said, Tell me, I pray thee, thy n e." In the earlier part of this mysterious enc nter, there was no direct prayer on Jacob's part. W n we speak of wrestling Jacob, as a type of prev ng prayer, we make a mistaken use of this incide . In its first stages, Jacob did not wrestle for a bl sing, but the Angel wrestled with him, to overth w his self-confidence, to humble his pride, and to in ce him to cease resisting the loving purposes of G . Jacob did not understand the gracious intenti of his mysterious assailant, who wrestled through th livelong night, but withstood him. Though th y years had passed since he rolled aside the stone an watered Rachel's flocks, he was still hale and vi rous, and resented the attempt of his assailant. It as only when the sinew of his strength had wither under the divine touch, and he was on the point of lling limp and helpless to the earth, that he sudde abandoned resisting for clinging, and asked, as e morning glinted on the skies, that the departin ngel might bless him ere he went.

hat was his first real prayer; and it was the prayer of humbled man, of one who had suddenly aband d his resistance and become a helpless suppliant fo blessing. The second petition was on the same pl e. "Tell me, I pray thee, thy name." We m pray this with unbroken persistence, for there ar deeper and yet deeper revelations to be made, un the day of eternity breaks on the soul. What w the reply? It is not told us here. But as Jacob w dying, he uttered the word Shiloh—"until Sh h come"—and Shiloh means the Peace-Giver. M not this have been the name that Jesus breathed in s ear? F. B. M.

When Anger Is Sin

TUESDAY, August 29. Eph. 4 : 26. "Be ye angry, and sin not." It would seem from the Sc ptures that there are times when anger may be righteous, and other times when it is sin. How are we to know the difference?

You have a boy who has overridden your authority, spent your money in riotous living, and brought disgrace upon your head. It is natural that you should be incensed at his disrespect for you, and you say: "We will see who is to be master in my house. I will teach him a lesson that he will remember!"

Now, this anger on your part may be only a sense of wounded pride or self-love, and your resentment may be like any other appetite of nature, like hunger or thirst or weariness. There is no particular morality in it; it is simply what any unregenerate human would feel. Let this kind of anger have a free course, and it endangers the parent more than the son. for it usually reacts on the father's own head.

But suppose you say, "This act of my son is an injury to the community; love and confidence, as principles, have been violated." You get away from and above self-conscious pride and the sense of wounded self-respect, and are in position to treat the matter sanely as a Christian.

Here is a question that will help us determine whether our anger is or is not sinful. When we are angry over an injury received, ask this: "Would your anger be the same if this injury had been offered to some one else?" Can you get above the fact, "He did it to me?" Then you have passed the line of the secular into the spiritual, in touch with the principle of Jesus, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these."

Anger that is selfish is usually sinful. C. S. C.

He Gives Us What We Lack

WEDNESDAY, August 30. Ex. 3 : 1-11. "And Moses said unto God—" We are surely justified in including this wonderful colloquy among the prayers of the Bible, because prayer consists not only in direct petition, but in those profound colloquies in which man accepts the divine invitation, "Come, let us reason together." God's voice still speaks to those whose hearts are quiet enough to listen. By written letter or printed page, by the beauty of a holy life, by the voice of some living teacher, or by the direct intuition of the heart, the God of past generations still speaks his messages and summonses to anointed ears; and those are the best incentives to prayer. Our noblest prayers emanate from the mind of God, and excite deep responses from our hearts. Speak back to him reverently and naturally all that is in your heart.

Tell him how unworthy you are to be his instrument. "Who am I that I should go!" Ask him for the message that you are to take. "What shall I say to them?" If you feel that they will not listen to you, tell him so. If there is some natural obstacle, such as an impediment in your speech, as with Moses, or a thorn in your flesh, as with Paul, throw the responsibility of it all on his all-sufficiency. Every inquiry will be abundantly met and answered. The contents of the Divine Name will be unfolded; miracles of power and glory will be added to your equipment; the uneloquent lips will be touched with a live coal from off the altar, and Aaron will be sent as colleague and spokesman. No single complaint will be unmet, no cry unheard. Out of that poor, broken expostulation of yours will issue, among other things, the song of victory beside your Red Sea. F. B. M.

Virtue Bought by Struggle

THURSDAY, August 31. Rev. 3 : 15. "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot." The church in Laodicea, to which these words were directed, suffered from the evils that accrue to sheer lukewarmness. It had taken to itself a tone of loftiness to which it had no right, and it lacked the humility and sympathy which always accompany struggle and earnest fight with the temptations of life.

It is said that a big man always makes big mistakes. He is moving rapidly, one way or the other, to big results. There are some, on the other hand, who never seem to be in any trouble, and who never seem to be of great moment to the world. They are never led up into the wilderness of temptation, for the same reason that they are never led up into the mount. Their talents are buried in sluggishness. They do not have enough struggle in their lives to breed enthusiasm. Like the Laodiceans, they "have need of nothing," and they are often inclined to sit in judgment on those whose active, moving careers are filled with deeds of wrong as well as with deeds of right.

It is frequently said, "A man must have sorrow in order to sympathize with those in sorrow." It is also said that beggars and people in need of charity go to the poor with greater prospect of relief than to those who "have gotten riches and have need of nothing," for the poor know the pinch of poverty, and they can imagine the need.

It makes little impression for us to condemn those who yield to temptations that we have never felt. We have not yet "overcome" them, and our virtue has not been bought by struggle—the price humanity pays for experience and the right to the throne of judgment. Furthermore, when we actively plunge in and overcome our own faults, the throne of judgment becomes a throne of mercy. Struggle teaches us love. C. S. C.

Divine Consolation in Trouble

FRIDAY, September 1. Ex. 5 : 15 to 6 : 9. "And Moses returned unto the Lord." Moses and Aaron stood on the way to Pharaoh's palace to meet the Hebrew deputation that had been appointed to ask for a mitigation of their miseries. It must have been a terribly bitter experience to learn that their interference had greatly aggravated the pitiable lot of their friends. "The Lord look upon you and judge." The words must have cut into the heart of the great leader like knives. Was he mistaken? Had it all been a dream and a phantasy? Truly, he fell to the ground to die, not knowing how necessary the process was, if he should bear much fruit. There is no other resource for any of us, except to return to God with our disappointment. We must pour out our heart in prayer, else it will break. "Though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his tender mercies."

The time of depression with the discouraged servant of God is always a time of promise. Then God takes to himself a new name, gives an understanding insight into his dealings in the past, reveals his tender sympathy, which detects the slightest sigh of a child or the inarticulate groan of age, and pledges himself with a sevenfold guarantee. Prayer often becomes a blessed talk between the despairing soul and God, who meets it with heaped-up promises. Have your Bible at hand when you are on your knees, so that you may turn to one of those exceeding great and precious assurances, which are all Yea and Amen in Christ Jesus. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? For I shall yet praise Him who is the health of my countenance, and my God." F. B. M.

"The Handmaid of the Lord"

SATURDAY, September 2. Luke 1 : 46, 47. "My soul doth magnify the Lord; my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour."

"O wondrous mother, was there ever joy like thine?
To thee it came, that message from the Highest!
  Such as to woman ne'er before descended;
The Almighty's wings thy soul o'erspread,
  And with thy life the life of worlds was blended!"

What sublime, ecstatic rapture must have filled the soul of Mary as she sang "All generations shall call me blessed!" Not wise nor rich nor great, but blessed, through her Son becoming the world's Saviour!

This song is a sublime prophecy, crystallizing the hopes of the world since creation's morning. It recounts the past goodness of God and idealizes the glorious future of Christ's kingdom. How enchanting must have been the announcement of the angel Gabriel as he whispered the wondrous words that the Holy Son of God should be born of her. Such words had never been spoken to woman before. How her imagination was thrilled with bright hopes, blossoming into the praise of holy song, as she received this message to gladden the millions of earth!

Prophets had predicted, but no mortal lips would ever have uttered what the angel said. She knew the world would scorn her, misunderstand her, and perhaps her affianced, Joseph, might forsake her; yet she triumphantly exclaimed, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord! Be it unto me according to thy word!"

God gave Mary no palace, no chariot, no worldly glory, no earthly distinction. To become the mother of the Son of God—that was greatness beyond that of any other mortal. E. W. C.

Governor Capper's Challenge

KANSAS and Nebraska are sister states. When Governor Arthur Capper of the former state visited Lincoln early in August, he thought it a fitting opportunity to set right a few popular misconceptions relative to things moral, social and economic in his own big state. Governor Capper has the faculty of investing any topic he touches with human interest, and when he spoke of the results of thirty-four years of prohibition in Kansas, he practically flung down a challenge that appeals to the whole country. Every state adopting prohibition must expect to become a target for misrepresentation. Its people must not be surprised when they encounter the astonishing assertions that insanity has increased suddenly, poor-houses have been filled to overflowing, business has been depressed, taxes have risen, and crime has doubled. They must not get outrageously indignant when they hear that savings bank balances are declining and that pauperism, divorce and the other evils of the kind are rampant. These calumnies, he warned them, are "the price you pay for decency." It is a form of libel from which a state need not hope to escape. Fortunately, the real facts show a totally different condition of affairs. Prosperity has come to Kansas with state-wide sobriety. People are making and saving money; arrests for drunkenness have constantly decreased, although population steadily increases. The strongest advocates of temperance are the large employers of labor, managers of big railroad properties, and the labor organizations. More and better work is done in every line of industry all the year round. The percentage of workingmen who own their own homes is probably the highest of any state in the union. Home life with its surroundings is more attractive, and divorces have declined. Many Kansas cities have put in big municipal improvements in late years—paving, electric lighting, parks, water works—not a dollar of the cost being contributed by the liquor traffic. There is not in any city in that state today a "red light" district or a vicious slum. It has been a moral clean-up, far-reaching and thorough. Taxes have materially declined since the saloons were suppressed, owing to the diminution of crime. In some places it has been found practicable to reduce the police force. When the old argument was used that the driving out of the saloon would spell ruin to business, the people took the risk. A visiting delegation tried to persuade the state attorney-general to restore the saloon, but were astonished at his reply: "For God's sake, don't let the old, rotten order of things return to Kansas City! We are well rid of it, and the town was never so prosperous as now." And this is the popular verdict today. Forty counties in the state did not send a single prisoner to the state penitentiary last year. In one county, the jail, which had been empty for two years, is now used as a corn crib. Poverty and illiteracy are disappearing. Thirty-two counties have abandoned their public poor farms, and in the whole state less than nine hundred paupers are being cared for in county institutions. The bigger part of the criminal cases tried in the state courts is due to the influx of liquor from other states, and in most cases the culprits are not Kansas citizens.

Kansas wants the whole Union to know the truth about these things. It has chosen a decent road for its people to travel, and it intends to go right along on this new and clean highway. Governor Capper's address in pamphlet form should be circulated and read wherever there is a liquor question. It is one of the most convincing temperance arguments we have ever seen.

The Farther View of Life

WE laugh at the man who frets and vexes himself over transient conditions as though they were permanent ones. The most ridiculous people you meet with in traveling, the people you estimate at the lowest figure for good sense or good breeding, are the fussy ones who are always grumbling about the food, or the waiters, or the beds, or the hot weather, professing to find nothing as anticipated, or as they have been accustomed to having it. But do we recognize the larger application of this principle? Suppose we simply enlarge the spaces a little, and set this life of sixty, seventy, fourscore years over against the eternal life of the future. As the vestibule is to the hall, as the half-hour of transit on the car is to the day's business, so is this life to that. Do we realize it? Do we really look upon this life as only the antechamber, or the few minutes of travel to the place of full occupation? Can we bring ourselves to regard our real life as beginning only when this life of transitoriness shall be over, to look for our permanent interests in the life beyond, and to treat the affairs of this life accordingly? Let's try!

A Word Worth While

AMONG the congratulatory letters received by the mayor of an Ohio city, nominated for the fifth time, was one from a young man who once found himself in hard luck, and under arrest for vagrancy, but was released by the mayor with a word of kindness and encouragement. The young man writes that he has been a useful member of society ever since, that today he is doing well, and that he owes his opportunity and success to the leniency and encouragement then given him.

This is a practical, touching tribute to the dynamic power that lies hidden in a kindly word.

The power may not always seem to assert itself, but it always is there, just as there always is warmth and life in sunshine, that, though clouds obscure it from our sight, never ceases to glow, and never glows in vain.

The sunbeam may fall on desert sands, and produce no flower or blade of grass, or even shrub, and yet it is not wasted; it creates warm winds that waft over far-off fertile lands, and shield them from the frost of night and thrill them into life by day.

No sunshine is ever lost.

Nor is any kind word.

The sunshine buries itself deep in the tough fiber of the oak, but it dances forth again in the glow and heat of the genial fire.

Just so, the kind word that has gladdened a soul glints on through the world as a gladness forever.

The sun is warmed only by the heat it gives out. And the human soul can know only the kindness it is capable of giving.

Every kind impulse, thought, word or act sets a gracious glow first in the heart in which it originates.

Whether the kindness sink into the heart to which it was directed, or be wafted elsewhere as life-giving warmth, the glow of the giving ever after remains in the heart that gave.

To the young man who was clear down, this mayor gave more than official leniency. He gave a part of himself. To give the man a real chance he had to give him courage, for without courage no man has a chance. The good that may be in one must lie dead until courage quickens it to life, as sunshine quickens seeds.

A man is not to be despised because he is down. It must not be assumed that he is so because he lacks the qualities that uplift. There is a good deal that is paradoxical about hard luck. The man who is most accustomed to constant employment and good living becomes, if he loses his employment, the most utterly lost and helpless. The world is at once transformed into a mystery that his eyes never gazed upon before. The outlook he views is one with which the confirmed loafer is thoroughly familiar, and which the adroit adventurer has carefully studied; but to the man who has given his life to steady toil, the new situation is incomprehensible and alarming. He is the most apt to lose heart and hope, and to hang his head, particularly if he be among strangers. He is the first man to feel himself to be a vagrant and to appear one. In court he has the least to say in his own defense. He has not learned the art or need of dissembling. He has not learned that poverty is suspicious and hard luck a crime.

All the best elements of man may be there—except one, and that one has been chilled out of him. Fertile soil is there and good seed. All that is wanting is the sunshine of kind words. These give him hope and courage; and the man who has the right stuff in him, and, in spite of hard luck, has courage, will win out. No deeps can engulf him. No weight of misfortune can hold him down. Upon him a single word of kindness may exert at once its dynamic force.

Not all of us can be mayors and set good men free from the charge of vagrancy; but all of us can, if we will, give to the despairing the word of hope that lights the way.

CHARLES GRANT MILLER.

Tortured Childhood Set Free

ABOUT one-third of a million children have been set free from industrial slavery by an action of Congress which almost rivals Lincoln's emancipation of the slaves. By a vote of 52 to 12 the United States Senate passed the Keating Child Labor Bill on August 8, after President Wilson had insisted that action upon it must not be delayed.

The Senate measure differs slightly from the resolution already adopted by the House of Representatives, and members of a joint conference have been appointed from both houses who will put the bill into its final shape. It is expected that the Senate for will be adopted. This prohibits from interstate ommerce any product of a mine or quarry in iich children under sixteen have been employed or a wed to work within thirty days prior to such shi ent, and the product of any "mill, cannery, wor iop, factory or manufacturing establishment" in iich children under fourteen have been employ or allowed to work within the thirty days. The ouse bill prohibits from interstate commerce those roducts upon which such child labor has been a ied, but reaches the same point as the Senate resc tion by declaring that the fact of the employm t of children in any establishment is prima facie ev ence that the product of the establishment is the p luct of child labor. The Senate bill also preven the employment of children between the ages of fo teen and sixteen more than eight hours in any day, six days in any week, or after seven o'clock P.M. or fore six o'clock A.M.

Senator Tillman of South Carolina, thou he voted against the bill because he believed it to i olve a violation of state rights, had some scathing r arks to make about the motives of the mill owne who were opposing it. He said:

> The grubbing and selfishness of cotton mill owners n e me almost willing to vote for the Keating bill. I ha been shocked to see men in South Carolina, rich, intellige well-educated men, who were willing to swell their dividend t the expense of little children. The veil of sophistry in thei tters could not hide their heartlessness. Their plea, stripp of all verbiage, is: "Let the children toil that we may liv luxury!" And yet we wonder at the spread of Socialism l the increasing hostility of labor toward capital.

This splendid victory for humanity si gests forcibly what is often the only way to right economic wrong—that is, to make profits on that rong impossible. The Child Labor Bill has bee rom the beginning a piece of adroit statesmanship, ving its genesis, if we are not mistaken, in the he and heart of former Senator Beveridge. The A ican theory of state rights made any federal chil abor prohibition based upon purely moral or senti ental grounds practically impossible. But Beverid and his friends and successors reasoned: "Sin the Federal government cannot stop citizens fro employing under-aged children in their indust l establishments, let us devise a scheme by w h, if children are so employed, the resultant produ shall not be marketable." The result was the sent triumph. It is apparently hopeless to appeal the consciences of some men. But make profit upon certain forms of wrong-doing impossible, a the wrong-doing will cease.

Meanwhile from three hundred to four h dred thousand children are set free. Lovers of ch hood throughout the world rejoice. But this very ancipation thrusts a fresh problem instantly to t fore. What will take the place in the needy fam es of these diminutive toilers of the scant earnin they brought home? The problem of child labor h been solved, and solved rightly, by abolishing i The greater and more complex problem of poverty r ains.

Dallying with the Literacy Te

ALTHOUGH the literacy test has failed uring three administrations in succession b enacted into a law, it still persists. Nothing discouraged by setbacks, its advoca recently tried the familiar but disreputable me od of smuggling it through Congress as a rider of t Chil Labor Bill. This trick being detected, how er, i failed like the rest. Now it has been agreed y th majority senators to take up the Burnett Imm atio Bill—with the test included, of course—earl n th next session. Probably nobody really expe tha it will pass; but the object in view, the plac ng o the labor vote, will have been accomplished It i a distinctly un-American measure, and the s ner i drops out of sight for good the better.

urderer-Reformer Pardoned

THE Savannah papers report the pardon of a man whose life has been as strange as that of the famous Jean Valjean in Vtor Hugo's "Les Miserables." In 1 7 he shot a man and, the "unwritten la" defenso failing, he was sentenced tife imprisonment. He escaped from t penitentiary, went North, and fin- a settled with his family in Danville. V After a clean record as a railroad ma he was elected by the Prohibi- tiists chief of police to clean up the n als of the city. With fearless in- teity he accomplished this and earned tl respect of the whole community. B one day a detective came and fond him. He telephoned the faithful w who had shared his secret for four- ta years, told her that he would not b home again, and quietly went back t prison. The constant efforts made si e then have now been rewarded, and h goes free by the pardon of Governor H ris. Word comes from Danville tl t he will be welcomed at his old post a hief of police. It is to be hoped that th world will let him bury his past and cotinue the new life he has begun. O laws provide just penalties for w ngdoing. But there are the courts of quity, where more human consider- a ns enter, and there is always re rved the power of pardon for all ca s where special mercy may be e nded without injuring the general w are. In this we have copied God's o ring of the world. His rule is e blished in righteousness and strict ju ice, but his heart broods over all, a at the first sign of penitence he h ens to pardon and redeem. He lo s to blot out a bad past and give m another chance. The prophet k w this when he heard God's words t is people: "I have blotted out, as a ick cloud, thy transgressions, and as a oud, thy sins; return unto me; for I ve redeemed thee." (Isa. 44:22.)

Plans Soldiers' Future

R H. RIDER HAGGARD, the famous English novelist, has just re rned to England after a visit to our c ntry and Canada. His purpose has be to promote plans by which grants of land in the British colonies will be m le to all dismissed soldiers when the w is over. He says that with many of their old occupations taken by w nen and by other men there will re lt a great restless exodus from the ol homes to foreign countries and st ngo pursuits. Thus the homeland w be robbed of her finest manhood. It well that farsighted seers should be lo ing ahead to that difficult time of re nstruction which always follows w and will follow this one. With a h e upon the land thousands can take u ife anew, and spend the rest of their d s in peaceful constructive labor. In ancient times the prophet held out to ne people harassed by constant wars th promise that God would give them p e so that each man might enjoy th harvest his hands had planted. "ution shall not lift up a sword against n on, neither shall they learn war any m e. But they shall sit every man under h vine and under his fig-tree." (Micah 4 , 4.)

Duel with Devilfish

GED Thomas Robertson, armed with a knife, fought a duel with a d lfish off Orcas Island in the state of Vashington the other day. As he w fishing for cod in his small boat, su lenly a tangle of waving tentacles fa ened upon the boat, wrapping th selves about Robertson's shoulders, wrists and hands. He struggled until he had partly freed himself, and with his knife he cut some of the sea-demon's arms. Even then he could not get his boat free, but was dragged ashore, devilfish and all, by two neighboring fishermen. The monster's tentacles measured six feet. Hideous as this experience is, it is not so tragic as the moral helplessness of those who have allowed the insidious tentacles of evil habit to envelop them until the life is sucked away. "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord." (Rom. 7:24, 25.)

Million Dollar Glass Loss

ONE of the results of the great munitions explosion in New York Harbor was the smashing of some one hundred thousand glass windows in Manhattan, with a total value of more than a million dollars. At this time of advanced cost of glass the insurance companies will find it a serious matter to replace this damage. Such an accident as this calls to mind the immeasurable service rendered man by glass. Frail and perishable as it is, it is one of the most useful of all the products of human invention and skill. Paul refers to the use of glass mirrors. "For now we see through a glass darkly." (I Cor. 13:12.)

Caged Animals Need Care

DICK, the leopard at the Central Park Zoo, is usually capable of cutting his own claws, even under the artificial conditions of captivity; for a thoughtful keeper provides a post in the cage upon which Dick scrapes his claws until he has reduced them to the proper length, performing the operation just as any tabby cat would. Dick, however, went lame the other day, and the keeper found that one of the claws had turned back upon itself and was causing trouble. So the head keeper said a little surgery was necessary, and the park commissioner came up to help on the operation, which, by the aid of ropes and some two or three keepers and the photographers, was successfully performed. Dick was very grateful afterward, even though he did not thoroughly approve while the proceedings were going on. A good deal of care has to be taken to keep captive animals in fit condition, as they cannot adjust themselves to the unnatural life in the cage. How pathetic is the sight of wild animals made captive by man: surrounded by human achievements, and yet pining for the old savage life of the claw and fang in the jungle! They are made for the life of ferocity and slaughter, and no amount of training will ever train into their spirits any contentment with the life behind the bars. They cannot rise above the plane on which their savage ancestors lived, and even though now and then a lion or tiger may be tamed to obey a master, its cubs are as ferocious as were its parents in the forest. But man stands in another sphere. Scientists of a generation ago tried to prove that we rose from this animal life of the jungle and gradually shook off our ape nature and climbed into manhood. But how untrue that theory is to the facts we see when we look at Dick the leopard, his claws growing for the killing, looking for a chance to slip back into his old life in the woods. We cannot tell how savage may have been our first ancestors, nor how meager their knowledge; but we do know that in the breast of the first man there burned the passion for something higher and better. And this is working out, generation after generation, until man is mastering all the physical world, earth and air and sea, and the animals are compelled to bend unwilling necks to his yoke. The psalmist looked out on nature, and then, thinking of man and the lofty place God had given him, he cried: "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet. All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas." (Ps. 8:6, 7, 8.)

A Crusade Against Gossip

AN English coroner's jury recently brought in a startling verdict over the death of a young girl. Although innocent of wrong, "the gossip disseminated by the women of the village blackened her name until she could bear the suspicious looks and spoken taunts no longer, and so ended her life." This made such an impression that an Anti-Gossip Society was formed, with regular rules, conditions for membership, and fines for violation of the rules. "Members must take a vow to avoid either starting or spreading any unkind remarks about any one else, nor will they listen to a person who tries to tell them. Before making a statement about any one do not forget to let it pass the three golden gates: 'Is it true?' 'Is it needful?' 'Is it kind?'" There are a good many "anti" societies that are merely fads, but here is one that is aimed against a real and widespread sin, the sin of the pharisee as well as of the publican. A careless habit of imputing motives less lofty than our own, of speaking disparagingly, and of imagining wrong in others, is likely to grow upon even good people until, before they realize it, it has become almost impossible to break. It not only makes them unlovely, but does untold harm to the objects of their slighting looks or whispered words. But, like all other ethical reforms, it is not enough simply to repress and restrain ourselves by our own efforts. While a great deal of practical good may come of this movement, finally it will have to go deeper into the heart from which the tongue gets its commands. A kindly heart is the only assurance of success in setting a seal on the lips, or better still, in making them the active messengers of love and sympathy. Solomon wisely said: "Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life. Put away from thee a froward mouth, and perverse lips put far from thee." (Prov. 4:23, 24.)

Boys Tramp Across Continent

ON May 7 three high school boys of Portland, Ore., set out to walk across the American continent. They arrived in good health and spirits at Atlantic City on August 1, after what must have been a test of endurance and grit rewarded by many novel and valuable experiences. These lads are showing the same spirit of push which made their fathers of a generation ago the pathfinders of the West when, trusting in God, they followed the hand that beckoned them on to a new country of better opportunity. The noble example of Abraham, the first pioneer, will always be remembered: "By faith Abraham when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went." (Heb. 11:8.)

Record Laying of Mosaic

THE floors of a big New York hotel having become worn, it became necessary to tear up the old stones and replace them by new ones, making a complete design one thousand feet square in size. This was done in the remarkable time of twenty-four hours. A large number of men placed the tiny stones, each guided in his little section by the pattern, until all the sections were finished and the perfect picture stood forth. There is no more striking example of what is really the secret of success in human life. All the myriad experiences that throng in on us and have to be met throughout the moments of each day seem to have little meaning in themselves, and yet if handled one at a time under a unifying purpose and with a great life design before us they fit together and make one complete whole of our life. God's words to Moses are quoted in the New Testament: "See that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount." (Heb. 8:5.)

A Rookie at Plattsburg

By BYRON PORTER SMITH
(One of them)

"YOU can't get 'em up, you can't get 'em up, you can't get 'em up in the morning; you can't get 'em up, you can't get 'em up, you can't get 'em up at all!" said the bugler to the bugle, and the bugle told it to the camp; but in our tent we were all wide awake and carefully dressed in our new soldier clothes, for our conscientious corporal had done the Queen-of-the-May stunt a half hour before it was really necessary. So we all filed out into the company street and found our place in the line after some confusion, then stood at what we thought was attention while the corporal reported us all present.

This was the first real day of camp life. The day before we had come by train and boat to the camp at Plattsburg, situated on the shores of Lake Champlain. We had been assigned to companies and squads and had received our guns and equipment. Each gun proved to be a body of wood and metal entirely surrounded by grease, and we spent the larger part of the afternoon in removing the grease from the gun and spreading it over ourselves, while all the time the rain fell steadily on the canvas and the mud deepened in the company street.

It was raining again in the cold gray morning. It was to rain at intervals throughout the day, and the next day, and the next, and two weeks were to pass before the coming of the first rainless day. The favorite camp song announced: "It rained last night and it rained the night before, it's going to rain tonight as it never rained before—" However, we assured one another that good soldiers never minded a little thing like getting wet, and we tacitly assumed that our commanding officers had requested a little rain by way of initiation. One misguided rookie in our tent, who had been told not to bring his golf clubs to camp, brought his tennis racket instead. It now hung idle on the tent pole like Tara's harp, with warping frame and breaking strings.

After reveille at 5:30 we had a half hour before mess in which to make our tent and ourselves look more or less respectable; then we were lined up once more for the march through the omnipresent mud to the mess shacks.

The food they gave us was of the class vaguely described as plain but wholesome. Boiled beef and boiled potatoes formed the solid framework of nearly every meal, while various stews and hashes relieved the monotony of existence. For breakfast we usually had hard-boiled eggs and cereal. The mess shacks were carefully screened against flies. We ate at bare wooden tables from granite-ware dishes. The paper napkins of the first few days soon became merely a pleasant memory, while that product and evidence of civilization, the finger bowl, was conspicuous by its absence. As substitutes we used—well, we simply didn't have either napkins or finger bowls.

Our table manners became strangely deformed. On the first day it was: "May I trouble you to pass the coffee? Waiter, will you get me some condensed milk? I would like a little sugar, if you please." "This food is, of course, very simple; but it seems to be properly prepared, and is no doubt very healthful," and so forth.

But after the passing of a few days and with never a lady at the table or within shouting distance: "Coffee! Coffee! COFFEE! Wake up, you grub-shovelers; have a heart!" "Grab that sugar, Bill, as it comes past." "Shoot the tin cow!" "Say, isn't this slush awful? Of course it's clean and pretty well cooked, and there's lots of it, but you absolutely couldn't eat so much if they didn't work you like a dog—that's part of the game—make you so hungry you don't care what you eat. But wait till I get back to Broadway, where I can sit down to a table with real table linen and silver on it, with some one across from me better looking than a rookie that hasn't had intelligence enough to shave for a week; then I'll lean back in my chair and say, 'George, you may bring us first—'"

From 7:30 to 11:30 A.M. we were at the mercy of the captain, a tall, clean-cut Virginian, summoned from Panama to be our guide, philosopher and friend. He was aided and abetted by two lieutenants, a sergeant and corporal of the regular army. We had our student officers in addition. It was drill, drill, drill for four hours every morning and frequently in the afternoon. We began with the very A B C's of maneuvers, without equipment, and gradually learned the more complicated movements in squad, platoon, company and battalion while carrying increased weight of equipment.

The afternoon was devoted to elective work when the infantry drill did not interfere. One could choose the cavalry, the artillery, the engineer or signal service, military sanitation, and so forth. My choice was the artillery. There were two three-inch guns and two of four-point-seven caliber down in the grove by the lake. Here we learned the mysteries of range-finding, sighting by direct and indirect methods, cutting the fuses, loading, and so forth. We did everything but shoot! The greatest sport was to stand up in double line a short distance apart and have each man send semaphore messages to the man opposite. There is something singularly impressive about the sight of a row of men solemnly waving their arms about like feeble-minded windmills.

AFTER elective work there was over an hour of free time in which one could take a dip in the lake, unless he had to clean his rifle, do police duty, or indulge in some similar pastime. The Springfield rifle looks like a rather rugged piece of machinery, but it demands more attention than a wealthy invalid. The captain had looked down so many rifle barrels that his eye was trained to see an imperfection as though enlarged one hundred diameters. If a microbe had crawled into the muzzle and laid down to rest in the rifling, no doubt the captain would have observed it, and what he saw in the way of rust or dirt he didn't hesitate to mention.

At 5:30 P.M. the bugle sounded recall. On this important occasion we wore the military blouse, with every button carefully buttoned, and stood at strict attention. Then came evening mess, followed by a lecture by one of the officers on some phase of the vast art of warfare. After the lecture we were free for several hours till bedtime at 10:30, when taps was sounded. Then every light had to be extinguished, and any talking or singing indulged in had to be done in one's sleep.

The free time was spent in various ways. The Y. M. C. A. shack would be crowded with men writing quantities of post-cards or reading the papers and magazines supplied by that splendid institution. Others would wander about the camp, feeling that it was improper to go to bed so early. Still others, cursed with the movie habit, would go to the village in the evening and forget their own sorrows in contemplating those of the screen people.

DURING the first week we wallowed in muddiest kind of mud. When we had nearly reached the limit of human endurance, the order was given to move camp to a higher location on sandy soil. Never was an order more cheerfully executed, though it meant half a day of the hardest kind of work. Under the more favorable conditions the mud on our feet began to dry and break away, and the original shoes emerged, but sadly aged and changed.

Mess tent at a rookie camp, but not Plattsburg. A rookie is a business man recruit who gets cured of war fever by four weeks of military training

By the close of the second week we began to act like a company instead of a mob, so our officers took us, a battalion at a time, to the parade ground and put us through our little stunt of all moving our guns or our legs at the same time and in the same direction while the major and all the world looked on. There was much mental agony in anticipation of this event, followed later by the conviction that we had done many things amiss and disgraced ourselves and the whole United States. However, the captain told us that we had done very well, and we decided to take his word for it, though our complete confidence in his veracity was somewhat shaken.

About this time we went forth to battle. Various fuzzy parts of the landscape became the coverts of the lurking enemy who would commit ambush on their fellow rookies and slaughter them with blank ammunition. On one of these occasions our squad had the melancholy honor of being annihilated when we were sent up against a whole platoon of the enemy on the left flank. Possibly we might have evaded our fate if the silly messenger that the captain sent to us had reported to our corporal instead of to the enemy's by mistake.

I myself got killed. (They thoughtfully shot us in the midst of a patch of wild strawberries, from which we could watch the whole battle between berries.) Being a ghost is an interesting experience. As I expected, life goes on just about the same before and after. I was surprised to find that I am not transparent. In fact, I am unusually opaque on military matters.

The third week was devoted almost entirely to rifle practice. This meant rising at 4:45 and spending the hole day on the range. We blazed aw at the targets, using ranges from 2 to 600 yards. Some made good r rds and more made very poor record but all were convinced that we could ave done much better if we could ave had another chance. The Spri ield rifle is a healthy kicker and the omparatively few rounds that we red at long intervals produced a fin collection of sore shoulders. We eculated on the damage that a day's ghting would do to the right wing o hat noble army of a million men ich, in the imagination of certain p ular speakers, would spring up over ght, fully equipped and trained, to end the country against invasion.

All the work of the first three eks was by way of preparation fo the "hike" which was to close the our weeks' period of training. All perfluous equipment was turned in and the night before entering upo our quest we slept like Sir Launfal, the ground. "Solid comfort," I hea the fat man in the next tent groan t imself as he returned to earth.

AT 7:30 A.M. Monday the reg ent began to march. Each m of us was equipped with gun, car dge belt, bayonet, canteen, one bl ket, half a shelter tent, a poncho, a reepiece aluminum mess kit with ife, fork and spoon, aluminum tent ins, a bacon tin, a condiment tin, ilet articles, and either an entrenching vel or a wire-cutter or a bolo knife. The outfit is made up in the shape f a cylindrical roll that lies along th ack parallel to the body and is sup rted by straps over the shoulders. t is scientifically planned so that the hole body carries the weight without ecial strain. Indeed, the optimist i our squad declared that he didn't fe the weight of his pack at all at the beg ning of the first day's march, yet he ame limping into camp at noon bu ned by an intangible something that s med to have exhausted his strength an put his good spirits under a temporary oud.

The weight of the equipmen that we carried was in the neighborh d of thirty-seven pounds. The add onal equipment of two blankets, a s ater and additional shoes and clothin was carried in the motor trucks.

The absolutely unavoidable and horoughly detestable feature of th hike was washing one's own dish A knife can be cleaned by sticking t in the ground, but with the other ools and utensils there is no escape; hey must be washed.

The first duty of the afternoo was to clean the gun. The tent mus hen be trenched against a possible s wer and a sleeping-bag made of ponch and blankets. Then for the swi ning hole! We camped each day a stream where the warriors could ash off the morning's accumulations o dust and do their laundry in a weirdly nasculine way.

At retreat the artillery band yed the "Star Spangled Banner" and ery man stood at attention and felt oble and patriotic. Mess followed in ediately, and then the evening l ure, in which the morning battle was ucidated. The favorite method of ending the evening was to go to bed.

For the most part, bright da accompanied the expedition, thou we had one never-to-be-forgotten erial attack on the afternoon of the s ond day, when a terrific storm burs over us and washed away some of the nts, while the enthusiasm of the hole camp was more than a little dam ned. As soon as the storm was over, uge fires were built and blankets and uipment dried out. Some of the bedr gled ones sought refuge with the dly country folk. "How much to p me up overnight?" said the rookie. our dollars," replied the honest agricu ralist. The newspapers said tha the natives welcomed us wherever we ent. They did.

Soap-Bubbles and Dream-Castles

(Sofa Philosophy. VII)

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

“LET'S play,” said the Girl, “that we're children again. I just feel like being—being foolish!”

he Boy looked at her as she stood th before him. In her short blue lin dress and low-heeled sport shoes sh ooked very much like a child—an int esting, rebellious, cuddly child, th boy thought.

“You won't have to pretend much,” he murmured under his breath. “It isr so long ago that you were a child. An it's always easy to be foolish!”

“Cynic!” chuckled the Girl. With a g little laugh she dropped down on to th and at his feet. “But I reckon you're ab t right,” she added thoughtfully.

THE Boy looked out past the Girl, to the deeply blue foam-topped ocean that curled up lovingly against th beach. The sun touched it caressing, and every few seconds a tiny breeze made a myriad new little waves, lik ruffles on the skirt of a party dress. Fa off in the distance a sail gleamed sil r-white against the sky. But the Bo looking at the Girl, thought sudde y that they were only background fo ner—the sand, the sunlight on the oce n, everything! He laughed again sof y.

“What is it?” asked the Girl.

“ was just thinking how easy it is to foolish,” answered the Boy. But he asn't telling the truth.

he Girl was patting lumps of wet sa together with slender, sunburned litt fingers. The Boy watched inter tedly as the wet lumps of sand toc form.

“f you don't mind telling me,” he ve ured, “just what are you making?”

“ castle,” answered the Girl. “A astle of dreams,” she added.

“Most castles of dreams are made of sa —or air,” said the Boy. Quite vic usly he poked at the foundations of e dream-castle with a flat clamsh . “That's why they're so shaky an unreal,” he said.

“But I haven't found them so,” protes d the Girl. “My dream-castles have be pretty permanent—fairly solid.”

“How do you manage,” questioned th Boy, “to keep a dream-castle solid? I' had my cottages in Spain and my ho s in Arcadia. But they've melted int the air. So now I don't believe in em.”

“That's why they melt into thin air,” sai the Girl, rather earnestly, as she pu hed a wall into some semblance of w and order. “That's why they ev orate. Because you don't believe in hem. Nothing that you don't bel ve in will last!”

e Boy poked at the foundations do edly, but with not quite so much vic nce.

“How do you figure that out?” he qu ioned at last.

“Nothing,” answered the Girl, as sh excavated a doorway, “nothing bu worth-while things will last. And if u don't believe in a thing, it can't be orth while!” Thoughtfully she dug ou a window on either side of the do way.'

“ve had worth-while dreams,” said th Boy rather meaningly. He had dr ped the vicious clamshell and was lea ng forward, looking at the Girl ov the top of the sand castle. “I've ha worth-while dreams that exploded be use some one”—he laughed a bit ru lly—“stuck a pin in them!”

e Girl sniffed. “We weren't talking bout soap-bubbles,” she informed hi “A real dream would stand any nu ber of pin-pricks. A soap-bubble isn worthy anything.”

TE Boy was looking far out over the water toward the little sail th stood whitely against the horizon. He vas so grimly silent that, after a mo ent, the Girl spoke again.

“When I was little I wanted to ha all the ice cream that I could ever eat and a pony, and a new dress every we . I also wanted to do something wo doing—so that I could support myself, and, perhaps, make my name a name a little worth having.

“All of these dreams and plans seemed equally important to me—when I was little. I wanted the pony and the dresses just as much as I wanted the good name and the glow of achievement. I prayed for the pony, I think, more than for the rest.

“I never owned the pony. And I never had all the ice cream I could eat. And I never achieved the—opulence of a new dress every week. And now I don't want a pony”—the girl laughed—“I'm too big for a pony; I wouldn't fit! And I don't want a new dress every week, or all the ice cream in the world. I've outgrown those wishes just as I've outgrown the pony. They were soap-bubbles. But I do, most awfully, want to do something worth while. That dream has grown up with me. I know there's something worth while for everybody in the world to do if they only want to do it hard enough. And some day,” cried the Girl, with excited eyes fixed on the Boy's face, “some day I'm going to get above just working for money, and do something big! For that wish was a dream-castle!”

WITH slightly trembling fingers she began to shape a turret that reached grandly toward the sky. “All castles must have towers,” she said.

“Towers?” asked the Boy vaguely; “towers?” His eyes were still searching out across the water; his mind was . . .

“Yes,” answered the Girl rather desperately; “towers, reaching toward the sky. It's the tower that makes the castle (even if it's only a castle of dreams)—a real castle.”

The Boy, groping in a sudden maze of words, spoke again. “Then a castle without a tower wouldn't be a castle?” he asked foolishly. “I don't see——”

The Girl gazed at him, hopelessly, around the side of her tower.

“Of course you don't see!” she exclaimed. Her tone showed a faint tinge of exasperation. “Of course you don't see! You—wouldn't! Why, if a castle, or an ambition, or a dream, doesn't have some high point of inspiration, what would be the use of it? It would be too close to the earth to be interesting or beautiful. It would be—sordid and dull and commonplace.” The Girl stopped for breath before she hurried on.

“Didn't you ever have a dream-castle, with a tower?” she asked.

The Boy's thoughtful gaze snapped away from the sea. His eyes caught the Girl's, held them, across the little sand house.

“Oh, yes,” he told her, “oh, yes, I have castles, and my castles have towers. All the towers are of the same shape and height. Do you know how high that is? ” he questioned suddenly.

“No,” answered the Girl. “No!” she said again.

“As high as my heart,” said the Boy, softly. His hand reached out across the wet mound of sand.

“And every tower,” he continued, “has one room in it, apart from the rest, and every room has one image in it. And all the images are alike—for every image is you! Oh, Girl!” cried the Boy, “can't you see? Are my dream-castles soap-bubbles?”

THE Girl, with a quick, darting little jump, rose to her feet. The Girl is rather sudden. Accidentally, perhaps, as she jumped her foot touched the foundations of the sand castle. Down it came, doorway, tower and all, and lay, a damp, grave-shaped mass, at her feet. Looking at it, she laughed ruefully—with a shade of tears hidden under the mirth.

“What are you laughing at?” asked the Boy resentfully. Again his eyes gazed, a bit wearily, over the sea. The sail, like a large white butterfly, was drifting out of sight. “What are you laughing at?” he asked again, unsteadily.

“I was thinking,” answered the Girl, “how easy it is to be foolish!”

Stolen Ideas
For Which We Will Gladly Pay

This Mid-Year Mitchell is the most up-to-date, the most complete car on the market.

Our experts examined 257 new models before completing this one. And they combined in this model 73 new ideas—all the best new ideas brought out.

Then they added 26 extra features—things which other cars omit. So this car has a wealth of new attractions.

Some of these ideas were copied from others. It is so in every car. But we shall gladly repay it by letting any rival use any of the many new ideas we have built into the Mitchell.

Build a Duplicate Car

Anyone may, if he can and chooses, build a duplicate of the Mitchell car.

But the factory that did so—matching our qualities—would need to charge a pretty high price.

Our chief advantage lies in factory efficiency. In this model plant, John W. Bate has cut our factory costs 50 per cent.

That is the reason for our 26 extras—extras which cost us over $2,000,000 on this season's output alone.

What Engineers Demand

The Mitchell is built by one of the greatest efficiency engineers. And to meet engineering ideals. Scores of the ablest engineers in America have already bought this car.

Mr. John W. Bate has made in the Mitchell over 700 improvements. He built 17 models to attain the present car.

There are 440 parts—drop-forged or steel-stamped—which are three times as strong as castings. All major strains are met with Chrome-Vanadium steel. All parts are stronger than necessary. Nowhere does the margin of safety run below 50 per cent.

As a result, there are six Mitchell cars which have averaged 164,372 miles each, or more than 30 years of ordinary service.

Mr. Bate has also attained in this Mitchell a low operative cost. No other car of its size and type can match it in miles per gallon.

We want you to see what efficiency means. It is something new in car-building. See what extra value it gives you, what extra strength and beauty. Do that, and you are bound to choose the Mitchell when you buy a car to keep.

Mitchell dealers are everywhere.

JUST DAVID

By Eleanor H. Porter

Author of "POLLYANNA"

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.

Christian Herald Prayer League

THERE should be a closer and more vital cooperation between the Prayer League and the Bowery Mission. The League members are already familiar with the fact that the requests for prayer received at the office of the Prayer League are made subjects of prayer by the Mission Brotherhood every week at a meeting specially set apart for that purpose. The leaders and men at the Mission testify that for these many months this beautiful work of prayer has brought great spiritual blessing and strength to the men themselves. But should not the members of the Prayer League pray more directly and specifically and unanimously for all the work of the Mission itself? The men there are praying for you. Are you praying for them? In a recent personal letter Dr. Hallimond, the beloved superintendent of the Mission, states: "I declare to you that every good thing that has come to the Bowery Mission, or that has been done by the Bowery Mission since my connection with it, has been because of prayer."

The Mission has many needs, both spiritual and material. The members of the League are urged to pray that all those needs may be abundantly met, that the Mission "be provided with what is necessary to keep the Old Lighthouse flashing out its light in the dark place."

Again a slight stoppage in the stream of publication of the Prayer League requests shows how fast they are coming. A few lines were omitted week before last: it was necessary last week to omit the whole department, so that this week the summaries are as follows:

Requests for healing of relatives and friends (three weeks' requests), three hundred and ninety-five. Requests for healing of self (three weeks), two hundred and sixty. Requests for help or guidance in financial affairs (three weeks), one hundred and seventy-one. Requests for varied desires and needs (three weeks), two hundred and nine.

Summary for Two Weeks

For restoration of sons' minds, five; for mental restoration or strengthening for other relatives, friends, or for self, thirty-two.

For restoration or strengthening of sight for relatives, friends or self, forty-four.

For deeper work of grace for self, one hundred and eleven.

That sons be delivered from liquor habit, eighteen; husbands, thirteen; others, twenty-six.

That friends or self be delivered from the drug habit, six. For conversion of sons, eighty-one, two including the request that sons return home. For conversion of husbands, forty-three; for conversion of other relatives or friends, one hundred and fifty-four.

Special spiritual blessing for others, eighteen.

Forced Exercise or Fun?

Apply your answer to oat food.

Oat food is also important. It is food for growth. It is rich in brain and nerve needs. It has for ages been the marvel vim-food.

In some homes it is forced. It is made a duty but not a luxury. Yet Nature lavishes on oats her rarest charm and flavor.

In some homes the oat dish is a dainty. Its flakes are made of big, rich grains, unmixed with puny, starved oats.

Those housewives have discovered Quaker Oats.

Men and women, boys and girls, revel in this oat dish. The food they need is the food they want. And they eat it in abundance, as they should.

Quaker Oats

Energy Food Made Delightful

Quaker Oats is not a doctored oat food. No flavor is added nor is Nature's flavor altered. Man can't improve on that.

We simply pick out the plump grains, the full-grown, luscious oats. Two-thirds of the oats are rejected as not good enough for Quaker.

Find out the result—it will pay you. Look into the package—see the big, white flakes. Cook them and note the aroma. Taste them and note the superlative flavor.

There are few food problems more important than getting delightful oat food. And it costs you no extra price.

10c and 25c per package

Paul's Sorrows and Comforts

International Sunday School Lesson for September 3
II Cor. 11 : 21 to 12 : 10

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"My grace is sufficient for thee; for my power is made perfect in weakness." II Cor 12 : 9.

Be sure to lay emphasis on those words f thee. Bunyan was not satisfied with ts passage, because when he first bet ught himself of it, he left them out, and reated the sentence thus: "My grace i ufficient." He threw it aside in a pet, ause it was not large enough. But n he was at a meeting, full of sadness a terror, he tells us that these words ke on him suddenly with great power. 'y grace is sufficient for thee." "At ch time my understanding was so ghtened, that it was as though I had s the Lord Jesus looking down from ven upon me through the tiles in the roof, and directing these words unto me.' The noticeable fact is that we must be reduced to absolute nothingness, in order to learn the perfection of God's strength, which is not seen in its most perfect form save in conditions of abject need. He giveth power to the weak, and to them that have no might he increaseth strength. If, therefore, you should have presumed to condole with Paul on his thorn in the flesh, or the many privations he endured, he would have retorted, "I would not have it otherwise, because the condition of supreme power lies in the fact of my supreme emptiness and need."

Am I Suffering for Christ ?

By Arthur H. Howland

NOBODY likes a boaster. Paul was a busy man, so busy doing every day the things that needed o done, that he had no time to spen and no strength to waste in boastng out what he had done.

H does say, in one of his epistles, hat here is something he is willing to boa about. "God forbid," he exlai in Gal. 6 : 14, "that I should glor save in the cross of our Lord Jesu Christ, by whom the world is cruc ed unto me, and I unto the world."

P l was a Roman citizen, born free, ra honor in an empire where most f t people were slaves or had been slav. But Paul did not boast that e d been born a Roman citizen. Nor hat he had been born a Jew, thou he was proud of that, and someime confessed this pride to those who lou ed it. He was highly educated, but did not boast about that. He had igh social and professional standng, ut he did not boast about that. He d like to boast that God loved him That was a thing that he was alwa and altogether proud of, always willi to boast about. Not only did God ove him, but God had showed that ove in a marvelous way by sendng sus to die upon the cross. It was his eath of Jesus for him that Paul boas d about. Christ had died for him now Paul was the slave of Christ.

I one marvelous passage in one of his ters Paul does let that boasting n t cross of Christ take the form of boas ng about himself. He goes over the t of the things he had suffered or rist's sake. He begins this unwon l boasting with many apologies and grets. It is forced upon him, he decl s, because these friends to whom he i writing have been wavering in thei oyalty to him and to his teaching.

LU E does not record the five times at Paul was beaten by the Jews. It is nteresting to remember that the Jews nade thirty-nine stripes the limit of t scourging. Their law forbade them to inflict more than forty blows (Deu 25 : 3). And for fear the scourger d the officers might make a mistake n counting and so trangress the law, e custom was never to give more than thirty-nine. Luke fails also to men n two of the three occasions upon whic the apostle was "beaten with rods He does tell about the flogging at lippi (Acts 16 : 23). The stonng ferred to took place at Lystra (Act 14 : 19). That was a pretty seve ordeal, for his assailants, after they vere through with him, dragged him long the ground outside of the city. elieving him to be dead. The three shipwrecks referred to here are not ntioned in the Acts. Luke does reco a thrilling shipwreck episode in the venty-seventh chapter of Acts, but is took place much later. We know that Paul did a lot of traveling by a. Many voyages are merely men ned; others must be inferred from statements in his epistles and in the Acts; so it is not surprising that, being so much a seafaring man in those days of primitive navigation, he should three times have been in a wreck.

After Paul thinks he will mention no more of his sufferings he happens to remember the strange experience of being let down in a basket outside the Damascus wall, and stops to refer to that. Luke narrates this incident in Acts 9 : 23-25. Adult pupils will be interested to look up the history of Aretas, at this time king of Damascus, and his relationship with Herod Antipas. A number of Arabian kings bore the name or title of Aretas, ruling a region of which the city of Petra was the capital.

NOW Paul begins another phase of his boasting. Remember that what he is after is to hold them to their loyalty to Christ. They must seek no other Saviour but him. Paul's sufferings prove the greatness of Christ and the genuineness of Paul's claim to be his servant. Now he proceeds to tell not of suffering but of blessing. He speaks of one particular blessing so great that as he tries to remember it he cannot tell whether he was in the body or out of the body; so blissful that it can only be described by saying that he was for a time in Paradise, so stupendous, so far above all ordinary human experience, that it was not only impossible, but would have been unseemly, to attempt to tell it in full. This is the man Paul is willing to boast about; not Saul, not Paul even, but a man whom Jesus had blessed with gladness unspeakable.

Paul's great blessing was followed by great trouble—a trouble perhaps greater than all those that he has been enumerating. Just what was the "thorn in the flesh" that came to torment him, Bible students have never been able to determine. The general idea of scholars has been that it was an affliction of the eyes, ophthalmia, in varying forms and degrees, being very common in the East. In praising the love and faithfulness of the Galatians, Paul declares that they would have torn out their own eyes and given them to him (Gal. 4 : 15). When he rebuked the high priest for smiting him and then said: "I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest" (Acts 23 : 5), there is an indication that he was very nearsighted. For the high priest's regalia was unmistakable. There is another strong indication of partial blindness in Gal. 6 : 11, which is clearly brought out in the American Revision: "See with how large letters I write unto you with mine own hand." Here is a picture of the half-blind apostle, bending low over his parchment or papyrus, making big letters that he could see. In fact, this affliction might almost be inferred from Paul's terrible experience in Damascus when he was blind for three days as a result of the splendor of the heavenly vision. As Jacob limped upon his thigh ever after his wrestling prayer by the brookside, so Paul may always have had dim eyesight after the a car of individuality at a moderate price

4 cylinder motor

55 in. rear springs

Full floating rear axle

112 in. wheelbase

Weight 2300 lbs.

Every car owner likes to feel that his car is individual in appearance—that it is unusual in a pleasant degree—that it reflects his good taste. Now for the first time this satisfaction, so long confined to expensive cars, is to be had at a moderate price—$850.

The Allen Classic—deserving of the name—marks the beginning of a new period in motor car finish. The body, hood and wheels are of a pleasing, yet different "smoke" brown, with fine gold striping and black fenders and radiator.

The upholstery is that luxurious Spanish brown, which completes an ultra-special finish that is not only exceptionally attractive, but exceptionally practical.

The body is roomy and comfortable and the chassis mechanically correct.

There is a Roadster at the same price.

Handsome illustration in actual colors on request.

glory of that revelation of the Son of God. There have been many other conjectures as to what this affliction was, but though many of them are ingenious, they cannot be strongly supported.

The great value of this episode in Paul's life is entirely independent of our knowledge of what the affliction was. It is the great classical answer to the wistful, ever-recurring question, "Why are my prayers not answered?" The answer is that the prayers are answered; answered in a better way than we had thought possible. Paul asked for some special sort of help or healing, but what he got was better—the conscious, comforting presence of his Lord. He asked probably for more bodily health; he got greater spiritual health. He asked for healing; he got grace, God's heavenly grace for his soul. He asked for more physical power; he got greater spiritual power. He was very glad after all that it turned out this way. He rejoiced then in the weakness, because it made way for the power of Christ.

A mature and splendid Christian worker who has suffered many disappointments in life says frequently to his friends: "When God takes anything away from me, I always say, 'Well, Lord, what have you got for me now? I know that you took this joy away from me in order that you might give me greater joy.'"

Jesus and Paul stand at the very head of the world-answerers of the problem of pain. It is, next to sin, the greatest problem of life; and they answer the problem, not by explaining pain, but by bearing it. They do not show us how to explain pain; they make not the slightest pretense of showing us how to avoid it; but they do show us how to bear it. Jesus and Paul were companions in their pain. The Saviour's call to Paul was a call to suffer. He said to Ananias when he sent him to comfort Paul, "I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake."

We may imagine that one thought helped Paul in rather a grim sort of way to bear his trials. He remembered how many Christians he had scourged and imprisoned; he remembered that he had sanctioned the stoning of saintly Stephen, and we cannot doubt that he was glad to make some sort of a ne-ment by his own suffering for the s er-ings he had caused these other foll ers of his Lord.

How we all wish that Paul had ept a diary, like Wesley and Asbury nd George Müller! What wonderful ad-ing it would have made! A frie of mine, a successful novelist and et, told me that one time, while sto ng at a farmhouse, he found the vol nes of Wesley's Journal. They were al ost the only books available, so he ent considerable time with them. A he read, he told me, he could not elp feeling it was a pity that the lit ary critics had spent so much time pra ng the works of essayists like Ad on, when here was literature written at hat same period in English letters ich had equal splendor and perfecti of style, and yet contained materi so infinitely much more worth while.

The keynote of the lesson is cou ge. We do not need to go to war to ow that we are brave. Professor J nes wrote a masterly essay, "The ral Equivalent for War," showing ho our daily work, if it is well and faitl lly and vigorously done, will do all hat war could ever do to make us ly strong and brave. Few of us w be called upon to suffer as Paul suf ed, though there may be in the years ead unexpected opportunities to mak ac-rifices for the cause of Christ. ook up modern instances on the m ion field, or in the field of industial or her reforms, or evangelism, in which ple have made big sacrifices for C st's sake.

It is a shameful thing to try to oid hardship and suffering. We gain by eat endurance far more than we can lo

The officers and teachers ma be interested in discussing with the ult pupils one hypothesis that may elp to solve the problem why so ma of these incidents Paul mentions i his passage are not recorded in the cts. Might it not be that the tenth, ele th, twelfth and thirteenth chapte of this epistle, which are recognize by New Testament scholars as being rit-ten in an entirely different spirit om that of the earlier chapters, mig be parts of another letter, written uch later, after Paul's long voyage to me, and after at least his first impriso ent there?

Young People's Topics for Septembe 3

My Use of the Bible

Epworth League. Jer. 36 : 21-24; Ps. 119 : 11; John 5 : 39; Acts 17: 11

KING Jehoiakim, as narrated in our first Scripture reference, took his penknife and cut the law in strips as fast as it was read, and dropped the pieces into the fire. That was his way of using the Bible.

The next reference tells another way: "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee."

The next reference is from the lips of Jesus; but strangely enough Bible readers have failed to get the emphasis he intended in this particular sentence. Notice that the American Revision translates the verse, John 5 : 39, "Ye search the Scriptures, because ye think that in them ye have eternal life." Jesus was blaming them because, although they did read the Scriptures, they did not find him there; whereas the Old Testament is really full of him. Now he had come, and instead of looking at him they still, with their blinded eyes, went over and over the ancient laws and prophecies, ignorant that they were even there reading about him.

The fourth reference, Acts 17:11, is a very pleasant verse: "These were more noble than those at Thessalonica, in that they received the Word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily, whether these things were so." Naturally enough, the next verse adds: "Therefore many of them believed."

Here, then, are four different ways of using the Bible, two good ways and two bad. The first way is to ignore it and scorn it. People cannot destroy the Bible in this way by ignoring it or by burning it up. The Bible has been burnt many times, but it still flourishes. The king thought he was doing a very bold and humorous thing in cutting and burning the Bible, but the joke now is the other way about. He is laughed at and pitied as the man who made such a foolish spectacle of himself trying to destroy what is indestructible.

The second bad way to use the Bible is to read it blindly, failing to see Jesus in it.

The third way, a right way, is to hide the Bible in our hearts so that it will keep us from sin. The fourth way, and best of all, is to read it as the Bereans did, hunting fo sus. As we find him, we find the power th will keep us from sin.

Ask especially for the Holy Spirit's p as we read. Every real Christian has few beautiful verses that have come right t of the Bible and found a deep place in own heart, so that he thinks of them not as ving been written long ago, but as havin been spoken personally to him by God self. These are the verses that make the sou lean and strong, and aware of the saving, enc zing presence of Christ.

The Consecration of Home Lif

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P.
Acts 10 : 1-8, 17-24, 44-48 (Cons tion Meeting).

THE one place where it is most im tant and where it should be easiest t how ourselves real Christians is the place here many Christians are apt to be most eless and least Christlike. Young Christia old Christians, Sunday school teachers and cers, even ministers—people who are thoug of as truly and helpfully spiritual—when th get inside their own home circle, where t re is no pretense and no possibility of bein ated any higher than the facts allow, are t to show themselves terribly lacking in t real spirit of Jesus.

Just as Christ took a little child the perfect example of perfect Christian , so the home is the most perfect and most ural place to show the perfect Christian pirit. Love should rule there; and love mu rule the heart of a Christian. Home should the place where love takes the form of p tical unselfishness, and that too, is the cal the Christian. The success and happines the home depend upon the thoughtfulne and helpfulness shown; and that is the atm here and business of the Christian. Hon is a place where God's presence should felt, where God's name is honored, wher God is thought of and talked to as a frien and this, too, is Christianity.

So the chances are that if you ar ot a good Christian in your home, you ar ot a Christian at all.

Bonds: Classification and Description

General Mortgage Bonds

BONDS under the classification of general mortgage bonds have arisen as a result of the tendency toward corporate consolidation, and the necessity for providing a bond issue which will cover other bond issues on the individual roads of properties forming the consolidation. In some instances these bonds are a first mortgage lien, but usually they are similar to what is known as the "blanket" or consolidated mortgage bond. Generally speaking, these issues signify that a new security has been put on an entire group of properties that had already been fully covered by individual mortgages, which makes the general or blanket mortgage subject to prior liens.

Usually when a general mortgage is issued there is a provision made for refunding prior issues as they mature, or an arrangement is planned for the exchange of the minor issues proportionately for a division of the larger ones.

Refunding Bonds

One of the popular bond issues is for refunding purposes, and they are designed for the purpose of refunding obligations or prior liens, and are in a point of distinction practically a continuation of former obligations beyond their maturities. If a maturing bond is not retired by exchanging it for a proportionate amount of the new issue it is canceled and the payment is arranged through the sale of a proportionate amount of the new issue. The security behind a refunding bond is the same as that which protected the bonds which may be retired.

Unified Bonds

When a corporation has accumulated a great number of obligations another obligation is frequently placed on the property in the form of unified bonds. Railroads especially have found it advantageous to consolidate most of their funded debts in such an issue, which unites under one general obligation a mass of smaller debts. There are several advantages derived by the railroads in an issue of unified bonds. The obligations are consolidated and are thus more easily handled in that form than under several forms. From a market standpoint the new issue is more popular, as it offers unified protection instead of miscellaneous separation. As a matter of fact the unified bond in all its elements is the same as a refunding issue and serves practically the same purpose.

Bonus or Railroad Aid Bonds

In the early history of railroad building in the United States municipalities throughout the Central and Southern states assisted the construction of railroads by giving financial aid in the form of cash raised through the sale of bonds expressly issued for the purpose. These bonds became known as "railroad aid bonds," and were, in point of fact, nothing more or less than subsidies. Just after the Civil War there were numerous issues of this class of securities, many of which have been repudiated.

Collateral Trust Bonds

These bonds are not secured by a mortgage on the property of a corporation, except sometimes upon certain real estate, and always subject to previous liens, but secured by trust securities of other companies. A collateral trust bond may be indirectly a first mortgage by the deposit of first mortgages as secured in the collateral trust fund. As its name implies, a collateral trust bond is a bond secured by trust certificate or securities.

Debenture Bonds

In the United States debenture bonds are an evidence of Indebtedness issued by a corporation preceding in liquidation the preferred and common stocks. Usually they are nothing more than a general note in coupon form, but not secured by a mortgage. Throughout Great Britain and her colonies the term "debenture" applies to municipal obligations, the same as we use the word bond. In Canada, owing to close association with the United States, the expressions "municipal bonds" and "municipal debenture" are used without distinction. Canadians make a distinction between the word "bond" and the word "debenture" by using the former to signify a corporation security, while the latter refers to municipal issues. Sometimes the so-called debenture bonds carry a lien of some sort upon the property of the company, but in that case the proper term is "mortgage debenture" when used in the United States. It occurs frequently that provision is made that no mortgage indebtedness shall be created unless a "debenture" issue shall share equally in the security afforded the new issue. When a corporation deposits stocks and bonds in a trust company to secure another bond issue the new issue is termed a "debenture bond" in many cases, but more frequently is termed a "collateral trust."

Called Bonds

Frequently it is deemed advisable to issue bonds which may be called for payment at a certain period or on and after a certain period specified in the bonds and deed of trust. Sometimes arrangements are made so that bonds may be redeemed serially in their order of numerical rotation, in blocks, on specified dates, provided for by a sinking fund. Callable bonds, or bonds that are subject to the right of prepayment, are not considered as desirable by investors as those running the full period of the mortgage for a fixed number of years. It sometimes occurs that when a bond is being "called" the notice does not reach the holder of the bond, and as a result he may lose the interest payment by not discovering until the time when he presents the next coupon that the interest rate has ceased. This, of course, is his own fault; but when a long period is certain for a bond to run, and the holder has only to look after the collection of interest by the presentation of coupons as they become due, there is less responsibility.

Answers to Queries

A. R., IOWA. Earnings of the American Tobacco Company for 1915 were around 21.32 on the fifty million preferred stock and 20.05 on the forty million common stock. The preferred shares are entitled to 6 per cent., while the common receives 20 per cent. Earnings in 1915 as a year were not as good as in former years, owing to heavy competition. Prior to the dissolution of the Tobacco Trust, the American Tobacco Company was a holding corporation, and since the dissolution has shown a decrease in earnings. According to information gathered, earnings are now running around 4 per cent. more for the common stock than for the same time in 1915, and the 20 per cent. dividend seems to be assured.

E. C. G., ILLINOIS. The Call Switch Co. should not be regarded as an investment even though the prospect may seem very attractive. The company owns patents on an electrical automatic switch which may be placed in the cab of a locomotive and by a push button cause the switch to turn the train to a siding and automatically interlock it against all other trains. If the switch were established on all the railroads of the country, it probably would prove to be a very profitable business, but there is no certainty it will be generally adopted, and until it can show good earnings, it must be held as a speculation.

B. C. D., MISSOURI. The Ohio & Western Utilities Company's 7 per cent. cumulative stock may be regarded with favor. Reports show that after paying bonded interest, the earnings are equal to more than four times the 7 per cent. dividend on $140,000 preferred stock outstanding. It is an unlisted issue and very inactive, consequently its market position is not well established.

B. R. T., GEORGIA. It is not consistent to place the various flotations of oil and gas properties that have been listed on the New York Curb in the investment class. Very few of these companies do more than sell stock and make no attempt to pay dividends. With the exception of the well-established oil companies, it is better for you to keep your money and not buy any of the shares offered, even though, as you say, you are willing to take a chance. Ninety per cent. of the money put into Wall Street by the small speculators is lost, and the man or woman who takes a chance usually has nothing but experience in the end.

YOUR NEIGHBOR'S CAR

Suppose He Buys a Hudson Super-Six

One thing we can't forget in buying cars. That is pride of ownership. The car is a pleasure vehicle. And it spoils the fun to be hopelessly outrivaled in about the same-class car.

The Hudson Super-Six has proved itself supreme.

With this patented motor—certified a stock motor—it has done what no other stock car ever did.

It has made faster speed. It has done better hill-climbing. It has shown quicker pick-up. It has gone 1819 miles in 24 hours, breaking the best former stock car record by 52 per cent.

It has beaten race cars by the dozen—cars of a very costly type. It has shown much more power than this size motor ever before developed. It has proved matchless endurance.

What These Things Signify

Suppose your neighbor gets this car. And you, while paying as much or more, get something less efficient. How will you feel when the two cars meet?

You do not care for reckless speed. Such power is rarely needed. But the Super-Six has the capacity. You know it to be the master of the road. It will do what you want without taxing half its ability. And that means economy.

It will cover more ground than lesser cars, without going any faster. This because of its quick get-away when you slow down or stop.

Its greatest supremacy—that of endurance—means years of extra service. How would you feel to have a like-class car excel yours in these respects?

Means 80% More Efficiency

The Super-Six motor—a Hudson invention—adds 80% to motor efficiency. That is, from a small, light motor it gets 76 horsepower. The same size of motor heretofore yielded us 42 h. p.

This result comes through ending vibration, the cause of motor friction. It gives such smoothness as you never knew before. And it means a long-lived motor.

It comes in a car, evolved under Howard E. Coffin, which has long stood for the acme in fine engineering. And it comes in the handsomest, best-equipped model that Hudson has ever designed. If your neighbor gets it, and you don't, it may mean to you years of regret. In looks and performance, in prestige and endurance, he will have the advantage of you. Your Hudson dealer can prove these things beyond any possible question. And you should know them before you buy any high-grade car.

Any Super-Six owner—there are now more than 10,000—can tell you what it means to own one.

It was early. Mr. Armstrong was yet up. While Stuart waited the thoughts the night tormented him again. "She'll ever forgive me this time!" he groaned to self. "Why, I guess she won't even want e to come home! Still——"

He squared his shoulders as he eard Armstrong's step. His host came forw l, all cordiality.

"Glad to see you, Stuart," he said. You young men make us old fellows ashame I've just waked up. And there you've co that long trip over the mountains. We' ave breakfast right away. I've thought of hole lot of things I can lend you for the bin, while you're waiting to build. I'll sen hem over for you."

Ansel Stuart's dry lips moved once wice before he spoke. "I—I—won't need m," he said.

"Why, what's the matter?"

For answer the visitor laid the pa on the table. "I've brought back your per," he said. "There's gold on the land. I rich with it. That was what I wanted it fo The Angora goats were just a blind."

"There's no gold there, man," prote l his host. "I went over it when I first bo it it and didn't find a trace."

"But it's there," persisted the her, doggedly. "I've mined all my life. nd I know."

His tone carried conviction. The ther looked him over. "I wouldn't have b eved it," he said.

Ansel Stuart laughed mirthlessly. face looked old and gray. "I don't look st a thief, do I?" he said. "But I'm no uch better. It was no sudden temptation nind you. I came up here with the delibe e in-tention to deceive you."

"Well," said the other, reflectively you succeeded."

There was a pause. Ansel Stuart ros

Automobile Roads in the Arctic

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE just had an interview with the governor of Northwestern Canada, Hon. George Black, the commissioner of the Yukon territory. His dominions begin within thirty miles of the Pacific Ocean and they extend to the Arctic. They are a thousand miles long, and in places 300 miles wide. They comprise almost as much land as either Germany or France, and altogether are equal to one-third of Alaska. The country is separated from Alaska by the international boundary, which crosses the Yukon River about 100 miles from Dawson, where this letter is written.

Dawson is the chief town of the territory. It is the seat of government and the headquarters of the mounted police. Here the judges hold court, and here is the residence of the commissioner, who lives in state on the east bank of the Yukon. The government house is a large yellow frame building with a great porch in the front, upheld by massive square columns. There is a beautiful lawn in front of it and wide beds of pansies line the walk that leads to the entrance. In the rear are gardens filled in summer with the most delicious vegetables grown in the Yukon, and connected with them are the hothouses that supply the tomatoes and cucumbers on the commissioner's table.

The government house is the social center of the territory. The commissioner entertains a great deal. His wife is a beautiful American woman, the daughter of George M. Munger, formerly of Chicago and now of Los Angeles. She and the commissioner go camping together, and take long tours through the wilds, where the gun and fishing-rod supply most of the food.

It was in the commissioner's office in the administration building that I chatted with Gov. Black about his dominions. Yukon is so close to our territory, and its resources and other characteristics are so much the same, that it might be called Canadian Alaska. Therefore the most of what Mr. Black says may be considered true for our country as well.

There was a box of red geraniums in one of the windows, some wild roses in another and a bowl of black pansies, each as big around as a tumbler, on the commissioner's desk. I referred to these flowers and spoke of the wonderful vegetation which now covers the country, saying how different it is from what I had expected to find in the cold lands of the Arctic. The commissioner said:

"Our summers are as warm and pleasant as those of southern Canada. The only difference is in length of the season, and that does not affect growth so much as many suppose. Plants live upon light, and we have about one-third more light than you have in the same length of summer. By the middle of May darkness practically leaves us, and we have one hundred or more days when we can read our newspapers out in the open at midnight. Your dawn in the States begins about 4 o'clock in the morning and the light lasts until o'clock in the evening. The sun works for you only sixteen hours of the day. He works for us almost twenty-four. In the summer we have light all day and all night. Growth begins in April, when the crocuses come up through the snow. We plant our gardens by the middle of May, and by the latter part of June have vegetables to eat. Our chief summer month is July, although the frosts do not come until the middle of September. After that we have Indian summer and the hills are ablaze with gold.

"The country is virgin land covered with trees. The trees are stunted except in the river bottoms, where they are larger. We have meadows in the south and southwest, and also great areas that can be used for grazing. Dr. Dawson, who made a survey of the territory, said that we have 38,000,000 acres which can be utilized either for crops or for grazing. He compared the Yukon with some of the inland provinces of Russia where they successfully raise oats, rye, barley, flax and hemp. During the past few years we have been growing oats and potatoes and other vegetables all along the Yukon Valley. We have grown on the islands of the Yukon two tons of oats-hay to the acre, and we have one farmer on the Stewart River who has harvested twenty-six tons of hay in a summer. That hay is worth more than $50 per ton.

"The country, as a whole, is practically unprospected, and the improved methods of mining are enabling us to work more and more territory, where in the past the gold output was so low that it did not pay. Up to the present the most of the gold that has come out of this region has been from placer deposits. We have already mined more than $185,000,000 from the Klondike district alone, and we are still taking out millions each year. Our output of gold is now about $5,000,000 per annum, and I expect that average to keep up for years to come.

"In the last two years they have been finding veins of galena, silver and lead in the Stewart River district," the commissioner continued. "That ore is much the same as that which made the Kootenay famous. They shipped 1,100 tons of it last year to the San Francisco smelters, and I understand that its value averaged $300 per ton. The character of that ore is improving and they are now finding rubies there. It is probable that the ore in the future will run into values of $1,000 and upward a ton."

Dawson flowers, including the transplanted American beauty, Mrs. Commissioner Black, at the right

I ASKED the commissioner to say something as to the big game of his territory. He replied:

"This is one of the best big game regions of the North American continent. All shooting is licensed and restricted, and so far there is no indication of the game playing out. We have an abundance of moose, caribou, mountain sheep and mountain goats. Ten thousand caribou may sometimes be seen moving along over the country. Such a drove will not turn aside for anything. You can drive with a motor car through it while it is crossing a mountain wagon road.

"Indeed, I know of places here where you can go moose hunting in an automobile, and that within twenty-five miles of Dawson. Our moose are among the largest of the world. Their horns have often a spread of five or six feet, and it is not uncommon to kill caribou whose antlers will average over thirty points.

"We have mountain sheep whose flesh is more delicious than that of any other game animal. We have plenty of bear, both black and grizzly. We have wild birds of many varieties, including duck, geese, snipe and crane. We have five varieties of grouse. We have pheasants and ptarmigan. The latter changes its brown coat of the summer to rosy white in the winter. According to law there is no limit to the shooting of bear, wolves and small game. As to other big game, we issue licenses that give the holder the right to shoot two moose, six caribou and six sheep in a season."

The roads of the Territory of Yukon are said to be better than those of Alaska. I asked the commissioner how they are handled. He replied:

"OUR roads are built by the federal government, which gives us an appropriation each year for the purpose. The money is placed at the disposal of the commissioner and the council, and it is expended by the commissioner on the vote of the council.

"We have the Overland Trail, running from White Horse to Dawson, which is 350 miles long, and we have also roads from Dawson to the principal mining centers. We have another road from Dawson to the Mayo mining district which is 200 miles long, and, altogether, we have wagon roads to the length of 1,300 miles. All of these roads have a right of way sixty feet in width. Most of them are ballasted, and all are kept in good repair. You can go by automobile for hundreds of miles up the Klondike Valley and along the creeks where the dredges are working, and you can even climb in a motor car to the top of the Dome, which is more than a half mile higher than Dawson and twenty-seven miles away. One can take an auto ride of several days along the Klondike Auto Belt Line and find eating houses at which he can be served on the way."

"Will you ever have a railroad connecting this country with other parts of Canada and Alaska?"

"Several such roads have been proposed, and it is not impossible that one may be built in the future. At present we need wagon roads more than anything else. We aim to build roads and trails to all the new mining camps to aid the miners in getting supplies and to take their gold out. Our present traffic is transient and will hardly stand the building of railways."

"Stored-Up Energy"

Everybody needs it—stored for emergency in a well-developed, well-preserved, well-nourished body and brain.

Grape-Nuts food stands preeminent as a builder of this kind of energy. It is made of the entire nutriment of whole wheat and barley, two of the richest sources of food strength.

Grape-Nuts also includes the vital mineral elements of the grain, so much emphasized in these days of investigation of real food values.

Crisp, ready to eat, easy to digest, wonderfully nourishing and delicious.

Safest of Investment Bonds

Now Purchasable in Large and Very Small Denominations

Principal Guaranteed by the Scriptures

THE biggest opportunity yet afforded the Christian public for making the one kind of financial investment which the Scriptures invite with promise of full return in due season, is still open. It may continue for a year or more, but would-be investors should not delay an hour.

Every investor receives this guarantee: He that hath pity on the poor lendeth unto the Lord: and that which he hath given will he pay him again. Blessed are the merciful.

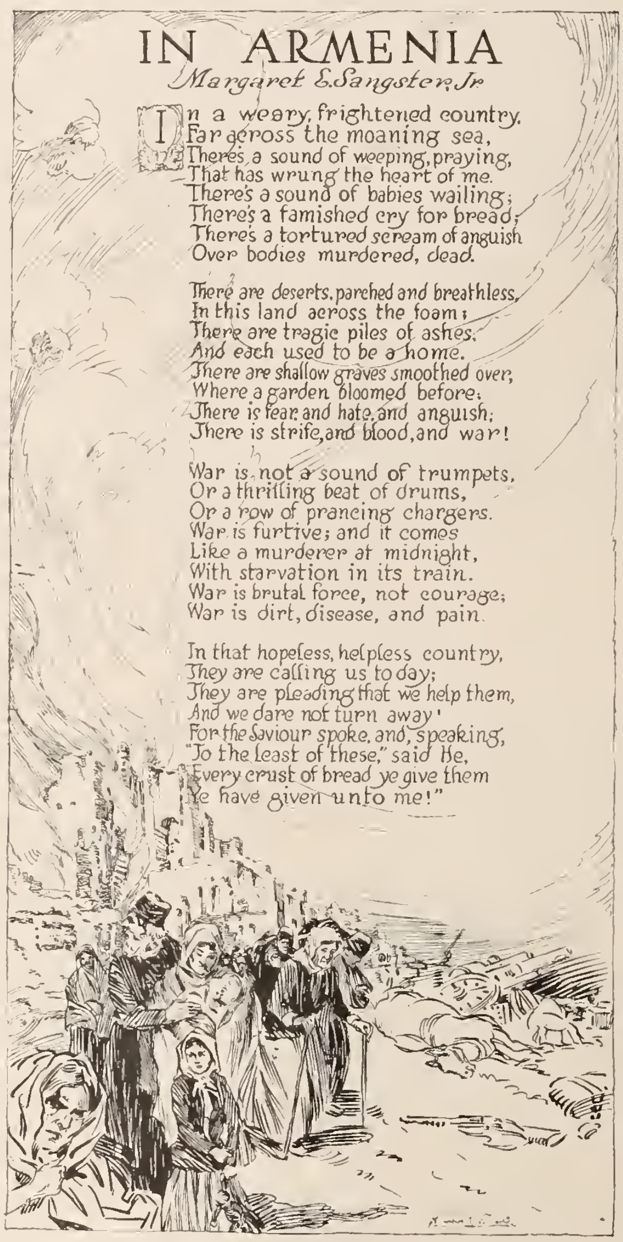
EXPERIENCE teaches that for inscrutable reasons the Creator has turned this world over to his creatures and works his own will through the hearts and wills of men and women. He heals the broken-hearted—by you as an emissary. He visits the widows and the fatherless in their affliction—by you as his proxy. He feeds the hungry, clothes the naked, and visits the prisoner—by you as his appointed substitute. If you do not do your part, some one else must do twice his own, and some one else will lend to the Lord what he would borrow of you for the relief of some poor man who cried unto him and whom he heard and would deliver (by you) out of his distresses.

NOW, there is enough money in the cities of Europe to support all the innocent victims of the war. Possibly enough money is being extravagantly spent there, even today, to relieve a vast deal of the suffering that war has forced upon women and children. Yet the cities of Europe are not providing for the millions who are without support.

But what is that to you?

OUT of the fortunes that have been made in our own country as the result of the war, enough could be sent to Europe to put food into the mouths and clothes upon the backs of perhaps every woman and child who have been made destitute by that same war. Yet that comparatively slight return is not being made by war-enriched manufacturers of America.

But what is that to you?



IN ARMENIA

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

In a weary, frightened country,
Far across the moaning sea,
There's a sound of weeping, praying,
That has wrung the heart of me.
There's a sound of babies wailing;
There's a famished cry for bread;
There's a tortured scream of anguish
Over bodies murdered, dead.

There are deserts, parched and breathless,
In this land across the foam;
There are tragic piles of ashes,
And each used to be a home.
There are shallow graves smoothed over,
Where a garden bloomed before;
There is fear and hate, and anguish;
There is strife, and blood, and war!

War is not a sound of trumpets,
Or a thrilling beat of drums,
Or a row of prancing chargers.
War is furtive; and it comes
Like a murderer at midnight,
With starvation in its train.
War is brutal force, not courage;
War is dirt, disease, and pain.

In that hopeless, helpless country,
They are calling us to day;
They are pleading that we help them,
And we dare not turn away!
For the Saviour spoke, and, speaking,
"To the least of these," said He,
Every crust of bread ye give them
Ye have given unto me!"

AND so, for reasons known only to their Creator, the hope of these millions of unfortunates lies chiefly in the Christian people of America. In Poland, village after village has been leveled with the earth. Farm after farm, until the counting becomes monotonous, has been made a barren waste. Until the count mounts into the hundreds of thousands, whole families (at the time it happened, happy families) have been exiled from their homes and given over to privation, exposure, terror, death. A race that had begun to dream of nationality and freedom and power has been reduced to beggary. Fathers who had begun to save toward the purchase of little homes cannot today find even the members of their households to clasp them in their arms. Mother have fled along the roadside with covered eyes to escape the sight c the little dead bodies they were forced to leave uncovered by the way The aged, who had thought to spend their declining days in restfulnes and peace, are begging from door to door in a strange and impove ished land for a daily crust.

But what is all that to you?

IN Servia, in Armenia, in northern France, in East Prussia, in Belgium in Palestine, in Galicia, the picture is the same. It does not seen possible that so many human beings ac ually can be in such a terrible state of wo It does not seem possible—but it is tru

If there were only one million in all th part of the world destitute, and it shou cost one dollar a week to maintain li alone in each of them, one million dolla a week would be required from son source. But those who know, those wl have seen this thing face to face, kno that there are many millions of suffe for whom prompt and continuous he must come from somewhere, or else tho suffering millions die.

But what is that to you?

NOW and then some big business conce that has seemed perfectly sound, fai and many Christian men and wom lose money they had eagerly invested the bonds of the company in prop expectation of good profits. We do n suggest that Christian men and wom who have lost their all in questional investments ought now to consider t miseries of Europe. But we do sugg that never has there been a bigger opp tunity afforded the Christian public making the one kind of financial inve ment which the Scriptures invite wi promise of full return. And we also sugg that the same alacrity with which m and women invest in any kind of financ scheme that seems to offer a big pro might somehow please Him who inspir one to say: "Pure religion and undefil is to visit the widows and the fatherl in their affliction, and to keep one's s unspotted from the world."

HAVE you one thousand dollars to invest in the poor whose rises ceaselessly to Heaven from Europe? Have you five hund dollars? Have you ten dollars? Have you ten cents? Why del in putting it to work for the Lord among his poor?

We invite every reader of the Christian Herald to invest some sum once and the same sum as often afterward and as regularly as possi in the relief of the Widows and the Orphans of the War in Europe.

Address your gifts to the Widows and Orphans Relief Fu Christian Herald, Bible House, New York, and he that seeth in sec shall reward you, as he has said.

Questions and Answers

S. M., Germantown, Pa. Are we justified in regarding misfortunes that befall us as judgments proceeding from God, or must we look to our own conduct for the explanation? In other words, in violating the divine law, do we not invite penalties which it is impossible, humanly speaking, to avert?

The Scriptures give instances of the swift and terrible punishment of iniquities which had been persistent and aggravated, and these have been set down as special judgments Nations, families and individuals have been so punished, as sacred history clearly shows. A nation, like an individual, sows and cultivates the seeds of its own condemnation. "As ye sow ye shall reap" is the divine logic of many a situation, the responsibility for which is blindly laid to the charge of infinite wisdom and justice, when it is nothing more nor less than the result of our own persistent practice of the sins of pride, immorality, selfishness and the love of gain and power. We are apt to ascribe to the Lord many afflictions that are wholly of our own making. If we have been rebels against the divine will, as it has been revealed to us in the Word and in the teachings of Jesus Christ, we invoke upon ourselves the consequences of such rebellion. Happy for us if we recognize in the hand that is laid upon us in affliction and suffering the hand of a Father who is ready to forgive and to restore. Still happier are we if, in our penitence, we learn the lesson that he who hates the sin still loves the sinner, and that though we may have broken his statutes in the past, he will give us strength and faith to follow them in the future if we ask him. For "the statutes of the Lord are right."

The War Aeroplane

By Margaret E. Sangster Jr.

The farmer children saw a bird
Up in the sky;
A strange, strange bird
That whirled and swayed,
But always stayed
So very high,
They could not see its flight.
"I wonder where it sleeps," said one, "at night.
It's much too big to live in any tree!"
And so they wondered;
But high up, and free,
The bird swept out of sight.
The night crept down, and still the bird flew far;
Flew viewless, in the dark, like some dead star;
Until it paused above a battle-field;
Paused there, and darted low.
And suddenly
From earth there came a flash.
The great bird wheeled
And crashed and fell (was there a scream?)
And lay . . .
The sun rose up, and with it came the day;
And waking from their sleep,
The farmer children rose, and went to reap.
"That great bird in the sky,
The one that flew so high,
I wonder where it slept last night?"
said they.

F. M. P., Jr., Robstown, Texas. The passage in I Sam. 16 : 2 is an exhibition of human infirmity on Samuel's part. He should have known—indeed, he doubtless did know—that since God had sent him on a special mission, he would protect him; yet the weakness of the flesh prevailed, and the prophet tried to evade service on the plea that he had "come to sacrifice." He was for the moment afraid of Saul's anger. Hence the equivocation; but his fear seems to have been speedily overcome.

W. H. H., New Windsor, Ill. It is quite possible that you and others also may have received a wrong impression of the minister's views regarding that clause in the Lord's Prayer which says, "Lead us not into temptation." Some of the ablest scholars hold that it is a possible misinterpretation, and should read: "Leave us not in temptation", for we are expressly told in the Bible that God does not tempt any one, although by the withdrawal of the protecting and directing power of the Holy Spirit we can be left open to the assaults of the tempter. (See I Cor. 10 : 13 and James 1 : 13). In cases like that of Abraham, who was "tempted" (Gen. 22 : 1), the temptation was not an allurement to sin, but rather a trial or test of spiritual strength and endurance. There is a very great difference between this and the case of a man who is prompted to follow his own evil inclinations and commit sin. God never leads a soul into such peril.

Miss K. S., Schuyler, Wash. Please distinguish between apostle and disciple.

The first idea of the term apostle is that it applies to the first group of the twelve specially chosen companions and messengers of Jesus. Then after the defection of Judas, Matthias was added (Acts 1 : 26) by action of the eleven; later Paul, by the choice of the Holy Spirit. The chief qualification of an apostle was that he must have seen the Lord. Paul urges in defense of his own apostleship that he too had seen him. (I Cor. 9 : 1). See also I Cor. 15 : 8. The term was extended later to apply to James, the Lord's brother, then to Barnabas, possibly Silvanus (Silas) and Apollos. Also perhaps to Andronicus and Junias at Rome (Rom. 16 : 7). Apostleship was recognized as the highest office and rank in the church. Disciple, on the other hand, is a term applied to all followers of Jesus. As to literal meaning, apostle means "one sent"; disciple, a learner, or pupil, one under the teaching and discipline of another.

C. A. R., Lorain, Ohio. Your letter deals with troubles that are familiar to mothers in many homes: the selfishness, the lack of filial appreciation, the inevitable misunderstandings, and last but not least the absence of the religious spirit in the home and the indifference—on the part of some members, at least—toward church attendance. These are among the things that vex the soul of many a mother, and cause bitterness of spirit. Such trials, however, can be met and overcome and even transformed into triumphs, if we only ask the good Father above to give us strength and grace to bear them. If we reflect that the responsibility is placed upon us to train those young lives so that they may develop into Christian manhood and womanhood, and that this is the first and most imperative kind of missionary service, we shall realize the importance of rising above all petty obstacles that cause irritation and annoyance. We might even say "Blessed be drudgery," since by cross-bearing in the home we can serve Him as acceptably as we could anywhere. There is a special grace which the troubled mother can claim: the grace of a quiet, patient mind that constantly draws reinforcement and comfort from the divine promises. And surely there is no one who needs to lean more upon the promises than the mother of a growing family. We have in mind a mother who every morning asks strength to bear the cares of the coming day, and we have never known that strength to fail her. She is the arbiter in all the little disputes, the peacemaker whose quiet decisions carry a weight that no outburst of temper could possess. She gets daily a renewal of the grace of a quiet mind, a heart that is stayed on God. She acknowledges him in all her ways, and she feels that he is directing her paths according to the promise. Many have been her trials and deep her sorrows, and she now sees that, but for that sure help, she would have been overborne. Her children love her because they recognize in her a quality of spirit that puts to shame all their quarrels, and a readiness to forgive and to direct them gently to the right attitude. With regard to church-going, it should be a fixed feature in every Christian home. The churchless household is heading in the wrong direction. How can the parents of such a home look for a blessing? Domestic burdens, in many homes where there are no servants, are so regulated as to call for the least possible amount of Sunday labor—just enough to accomplish what is actually indispensable, in order that all who can do so may go to church. Of course, in homes where Sunday is a day of big dinners and much serving, attendance at the Lord's house is made a matter of convenience, rather than a duty.

A. A. J., Larned, Kan. The path of unswerving truth is the right path, but there are times when none but heroic souls, with inflexible faith, can walk therein. At such times, the individual conscience makes the decision for itself, since no one else can fully realize how much is at stake. But if we are willing to pay the price—it may be in blood and tears—he will restore a hundredfold the worth of all that we sacrifice.

L. L. S., Ryan, Okla. What must I do to become a journalist?

A journalist has been humorously defined as "a newspaper man out of a job." The best road to successful journalism is through the humdrum and drudgery of the ordinary jobs connected with newspaper-making. Many men rise to prominent positions on big city newspapers who began by sending in reports of occurrences in their own neighborhood. Begin first to write reports for your village or county paper. Get a reputation for securing news quickly and accurately and writing it up in attractive style. Winning a local reputation for faithful work in the small town papers will give you a good opening when you wish to try a larger city. If anything of extraordinary interest occurs, telegraph or telephone a report to some large city paper or news association. If your report is accurate, prompt and interesting they will not forget you when you come to ask for a position. The Columbia School of Journalism, where young men are taught the profession, was ridiculed at first in some newspaper circles, but has now won a reputation for turning out good, practical newspaper workers. Editors are always on the lookout for new ideas and special features. If these occur to you, send them or take them into the wspaper offices. But ordinarily success comes from the ore prosaic tasks of regular news-gathering. Cultivate an naffected, bright, vigorous st of writing. Be on the look for what is new, surprising or l horous in the story you are ing. Above all, stick to the trut

Mrs. F. B. S., Santa Rosa alif. If the Father, the S and the Holy Spirit are a one, why did Jesus say: " osoever shall speak a vord against the Son of M , it shall be forgiven him but unto him that blaspl eth against the Holy G t it shall not be forgiven?" uke 12 : 10.)

This question, in one f n or another, has been dealt wit ften in the Mail-Bag, but yo ave approached it from a new ngle. The Scriptures teach th the Father, the Son and th Ioly Spirit are one, but they not teach that they are id ical. Jesus said: "I and my ther are one" (John 10 : 30); t all his teachings and his yers indicate that his personali was separate and distinct fro that of his Father. The passage you quote seems to mean at a misconception about the historic Jesus, the Man of Na eth, could be overlooked, but that antagonism to the Spi the same Spirit that was in Jesus (Acts 10 : 38), positiv disqualifies a soul for immortal life. There is a hint of th ame teaching in those stern words of Jesus: "Why call ye m ord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" (Luke 6 : 4 He cares more about what people are, and how they act, an vhat sort of a spirit they have, than he cares about what t call him. Judas kissed him and called him Master right w e he was betraying him. This is what people do who assent the doctrine of his divinity, but do not receive his spirit, not act like him, do not obey him and do his work. He s me up his wish and prayer for the disciples when he breat d on them and prayed: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost!" Wit hese thoughts in mind it is easier to understand what he eant when he made rejection of the Holy Spirit a greater s than rejection of himself.

A. B., Georgia. A genuine call to do missionary w implies a real and hearty desire to do this kind of work. op who go in a burdened, troubled way, feeling simply th they ought to go, are not likely to have much success. As a tt of fact it is hardly likely that they could go at all, t Mission Boards have so many applications from young opl who are eager to go that they would not be apt to c sider favorably the application of a young man or woman feli simply that he or she was under some sort of hea and painful obligation. If one is having an experience o problem of this sort, the first necessity is to get a better, eper happier religious experience. There should be the ent enthusiastic, gladsome feeling: "I delight to do thy ll, O God." Then, with this sense of loving God and hav the desire to please him, the thought of the sadness and glo and fears, the spiritual, mental and physical suffering of the eople in Christless lands, will come as a call to the most wo erful soul-satisfying, joy-bringing work to which a life can b iven

High Noon

By MARY KENDALL HYDE

HIGH noon in Wall Street. The chimes in Old Trinity peal forth, whistles blow, sirens scream, while from office buildings pour thousands upon thousands of clerks and secretaries and office boys and busy men of affairs for their noon hour. Luncheon is cut short as possible in crowded restaurants and cafés on a midsummer day, and the thousands roam the streets for fresh air and a chance breeze.

Jim and Joe were sitting on the steps in front of the Sub-Treasury, when they observed a crowd gathering about a man at the opposite corner. "What's he selling, I wonder?" said Jim. "Let's go over and see," said Joe; "it's shadier on that side of the street."

Almost in the shadow of the Chamber of Commerce, directly under the windows of J. P. Morgan & Co., mounted on the soap-box recognized as the street-speaker's rostrum, stood a husky, gray-whiskered man, talking himself red in the face, smiling, mopping his perspiring brow. Jim and Joe paused on the fringe of the now dense mass of listening men. "Repent and turrrn," said the speaker, and then interrupted himself. "You hear me say turrrn. Now I can say turn with only one r as you say it here in New York, or can pronounce it without any r's at all, as they do in Boston (illustrating). But where I live out in Denver we use plenty of r's when we talk, and in me own native country, Scotland, we put in a dozen or so more for good measure." The crowd laughed, pressed together closer, showing evidences of attention and intention to remain. Jim and Joe pushed as far in among their fellows as possible. "This guy must be saying something worth hearing."

"Repent and turrrn to God and do works meet for repentance," repeated the speaker, and without interruption from himself this time he rushed on, one word fairly rumbling over the other in an impassioned appeal to men to forsake their evil ways and accept Christ as a Saviour from sin.

The crowd stood spellbound for over a half-hour. Then the preacher requested that all should unite in singing the Doxology. Many looked askance. Some joined in unhesitatingly, baring their heads as the preacher started the hymn: "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow." As the name of God was spoken, every man, Jew and Gentile, Christian or whatever else, removed his hat and stood in reverent attitude throughout the hymn. Then with a word of prayer Rev. John McNeil, the Scotch preacher whose out-door services in London and in Denver are famous, dismissed his first street meeting in the heart of America's financial center under the auspices of the Evangelistic Committee of New York City.

"You can get more people here in need of the Gospel than in any twenty churches on a Sunday morning—or a Sunday evening," he says.

Under the windows of the banking house of Morgan

HIGH noon in Madison Square. Three orators on boxes, addressing groups of listeners. One is promulgating Socialism, another promoting the garment strike. From the third and middle group comes a young man to one whose dress and bearing proclaim him a leader among his kind.

"There's a feller that knows more than you do," reports the youth who had been listening to the third speaker while his leader rested. "You tell us to go to work because we need the money. That feller says there's something more important than gold. It tells all about it in this book," and he handed to his superior a copy of the Gospel of Luke. The man looked it over inquiringly, front cover, back cover, front page; then rattled the leaves through curiously, pausing now and then to read a bit aloud. And so it came about that, had you passed this labor leader, with his group of fellow Hebrews gathered around him at the fountain's rim by the curbstone, you might have heard him reading, "But I say unto you which hear, Love your enemies; do good to them which hate you, bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you."

HIGH noon in Washington Square. A motley company at the foot of the statue of Garibaldi. On the steps forming the base of the monument, a vigorous gray-haired man is singing in lusty tones, "From sinking sands He rescued me."

A. B. C. Cranston of Jersey City, who thirty-seven years ago gave up a lucrative position in A. T. Stewart's old store to become a lay preacher, now in his eighty-ninth year is speaking daily "first to the Jews and then to the Gentiles." At the close of his exposition and exhortation, an informal—but very earnest—"after-meeting" is held, as the aged evangelist sits on the steps with his "inquirers" gathered at his feet.

EVENING on Broadway. The White Light District. Electric signs flash constantly, electric lights glow brilliantly, all is light and life on the boulevard.

It is not quite time for the theaters to open. At a street corner where the living rainbow is most brilliant, an orator whose tricks of speech betray his previous knowledge of the ways of the world relates his experience with the "pleasures of sin for a season" and his greater joy in Christian life and work. Night after night he exhorts his impromptu congregations, and many remarkable conversions are reported to the Evangelistic Committee from this unique pulpit.

NOON and night and Sunday afternoons, all over the city they gather about the soap-box pulpits, the "common people" who heard Him gladly, and listen and discuss. What shall the harvest be?

The Fulness of the Gentiles

*A SERMON BY REV. JOSEPH H. BRADLEY

TEXT: Luke 24 : 25. "O slow of heart to understand all that the prophets have spoken!"

IT may well be that the same rebuke Jesus gave to the two disciples is due today to a multitude of his followers. For more than two years the Christian Church has witnessed the greatest religious crisis since the death of Jesus on the cross, and yet it fails to recognize its meaning. The political signs of the times are studied and exploited, with various degrees of intelligence; but the more important and vastly significant sign that bears upon the hopes and welfare of the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour is not discerned. A blank amazement, with doubts and fears beclouding the mind, fills the great body of believers, instead of the confidence and courage and the joy and eagerness which the unprecedented, ungodly struggle of this world-wide war should inspire.

The turning-point of the progress and triumph of the Gospel, it is declared, has waited for "the fulness of the Gentiles." This significant expression used by Christ (Luke 21 : 24) and by Paul (Rom. 11 : 25) has been too hastily interpreted to mean the time when the Gentile nations of the world should become followers of Christ, so taking the place in the Kingdom which the Jews forfeited by their rejection of Christ. The Gentile nations, instead of profiting by Israel's failure, have come short of their opportunity, and proved fully that they have done no better with the gracious privilege given them than did Israel, and that both have come into the same condemnation of unbelief, and both stand equally guilty before God, who now will show in the salvation of both, as the apostle wrote in an outburst of appreciation of this purpose of God, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out."

FOR nineteen centuries God nurtured Israel—from the calling of Abram to the time of the Christ Jesus, when "he sent his dear Son, saying, They will reverence my Son." But those husbandmen, instead of receiving the Son, "killed him and cast him out of the vineyard" (Mark 12 : 1–9). Thereupon, as Paul tells in Romans, eleventh chapter, Israel was cast out, and the wrath of God came upon them to the full. The time of Israel's probation was finished; they were cut off, and their place was given to the Gentile nations, to whom the Gospel of salvation was to be preached, and under exceptionally better conditions, beyond what had been given to Israel: under the light of the life of Jesus, and the helpfulness of the Holy Spirit to "convince the nations of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment." Another nineteen centuries have come to an end, and the probation of the Gentiles has come to its close, and today it may be questioned whether there is a really Christian nation in the whole world. "The time of the Gentiles has been fulfilled," and the same unbelief and rejection of Christ have been manifested by the Gentile nations which was shown by Israel!

The "time" given them has been largely wasted, through unbelief, selfishness, divisions among themselves, jealousies, rivalries, coldness and spiritual deadness. What missionary zeal exists dates back only about one hundred years, and burns with but a trembling flame which requires constant stimulation to keep it alive. Its response to the command of Christ and the grievous needs of a dying world is shamefully, inexcusably deplorable.

WE glibly speak of the nations of Christendom, as inferring that the civilized nations have title to call themselves Christians, and as such they present themselves before the heathen nations of the world—and the effect upon those nations—the majority of the earth's human population—is far from inspiring them with Christian hope and desire; and if we may judge from the exhibition of the unparalleled ruth and ravage carried on by the present war among the civilized nations of Europe, the heathen were justified in feeling and saying, "If that is Christianity, we want none of it!"

It is undeniably true that not a solitary nation on the earth could escape the condemnation of God as given in the Scripture (Ps. 11 : 2, 3): "The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, and seek God. They are all gone aside; they are all together become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no, not one." Not a nation can be found having respect for Christian ideals as such, nor which in legislature, courts of justice, marts of commerce, palaces of pleasure, courses of industries, accepts any rule or law of procedure, because God has spoken it. Throughout the so-called "Christendom," the two great commandments of love to God and to man (the "Golden Rule") are regarded and treated as an iridescent dream; man-made laws override the word of God; policy and public sentiment are the ruling principles of government.

We sometimes flatter ourselves by calling the United States a Christian nation. With a population of one hundred millions, only one-third are enrolled as professed Christians, or church members. According to published statistics, sixty millions are living outside of all church connection, and are non-attendants. Of the thirty-eight millions of church members, can we assure ourselves that more than one-sixth of these are faithful, heart-whole followers of Christ, and real Christians, delighting in his Word; whose supreme aim in all things is to please Him, and to glorify him in whatsoever they do, and who are shining lights for Christ in the world? If this estimate is correct, then five per cent. of the souls in the United States are Christians. But that is very far from making it a Christian nation. Can any other nation present a better showing?

THE MANSIONS

By Martha Haskell Clark

DEAR God, I seek no jewel-fretted towers,
No streets of gold, no pearl-emblazoned gate
When once I wake to greet those Other Hours
That past this highway's portal lie in wait.

But thou, who bound our hearts so close to earth,
Wilt read them still, and so, secure, I know
There waits me there within that newer birth
The home I lost so many years ago.

THE lilac-boughs will brush against the pane
In May-stirred fragrance, dear and memory sweet;
Forgotten echoes waken once again,
And through the silent halls familiar feet

Pass to and fro beneath the taper-shine;
My mother's face will smile with tender eyes;
My father's hand, warm-clasping, welcome mine
As once again we gather earthly-wise.

BUT then, ah, then shall be no hidden fears,
No dread of partings, gathered each to each;
No trust misplaced, no poisoned doubts or tears—
But only love beyond the need of speech.

And I, dear God, like some far-wandered child,
The journey o'er, too weary more to roam,
May fall to sleep secure within thy love,
And waking, know myself once more at Home.

IN the nineteen centuries since judgment came upon Israel "to the uttermost," and the Gentile nations were called to accept Jesus Christ as their Saviour, what have they done with him? Israel said, "Away with him! Crucify him!" Have the Gentile nations done any better? Is Jesus given the glory and honor due to him—even by the great mass of his professed followers to love, trust and obey him; or do they confess him with their lips while shutting their hearts against him; like Israel of old, "having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof," and fol ving the desires and devices of their own hearts?

Is not this present great war, in which " tion has risen against nation, and kingdom agains ingdom," the full and direct proof that "the nat s of Christendom" will not have Christ to reig over them? Does it not prove beyond a question tha here is no actual and effective fear of God befor heir eyes? Manifestly, the ethics of the so-called Cl tian nations is the same as that of the pagan natio from the beginning of time. It shows not even a t e of "glory to God in the highest, and peace and go -will toward men."

No single nation can be burdened with the o oquy of this war, for every nation in Christendo s in some measure responsible for it. They all bel e in aggressive warfare, and conceive that the ea and familiar fiction of national honor is paramount the honor and praise of God, and that love to our ighbor must give place to the passion of war a the murder of those who interfere with our lust fo ower and worldly gain, which are the common provo tives of martial strife. Militarism is but a single ture of that contempt for the teaching of Jesus hrist which dominates political, commercial, ind rial, civic and social life in all nations. Its un-Cl stian strife, selfishness, greed, and indifference to th ghts of the weak and helpless, have filled the wor with suffering and a growing discontent and rebelli All this is contrary to Christ, and in defiance of authority as the world's Lord and Saviour.

IS it not enough? Is it not conceivable th the probation of the Gentiles, enduring for n teen centuries, has now come to an end; and with sults similar to Israel's probation for the same ngth of time; in accordance with the warning of Pa that God would also cut off the Gentiles as Israel s cut off, if they became equally highminded and los unbelief and "their own wise conceits"? May n this destructive, murderous, world-wide war be the reatened judgment upon the nations, who are fille with fatuous high-mindedness and the fatal conc s of worldly wisdom, ruling on all the planes of ities, civics, industrialism and moralities, making th the very quagmires which Paul so earnestly depr ted? Those delusions have become more and mor bundant in these latter years in theologic "sc nce," whereby the saving power of the Gospel ha been smothered under a blanketing of various me y intellectual assumptions of human wisdom. Is not time that God should awaken the church a lay bare its spiritual poverty and peril? Is it not e ugh? The fulness of Gentile unbelief has thus come So have all the earth, Jew and Gentile, become g y in disobedience, as equally unworthy, that no God might show mercy upon all? (Rom. 11 : 32-)

According to the express word of God, and onsequent upon the coming of "the fulness of th Gentiles" (Rom. 11 : 15), the whole world (th "all nations") shall be quickened as "alive fro the dead." With this accords the assurance of hrist (Luke 21 : 24). From henceforth we may well pect a new manifestation and work of grace, hich shall include both Jew and Gentile in its nipotent grasp. This warfare in Europe, so eply stirring all nations, is the "trump of God" callin upon his church to awake and put on strength, and, med with the whole armor of God, to go forth aga st all the powers of darkness, with an indomitable c rage. It is the call to a titanic struggle against s itual wickedness in high places and all places, witho fear and in confidence of victory, under the lea ship of the Great Captain of our Salvation. Th signs of the approach of a great revival of s itual light and life are patent; already "the sc d of marching in the tops of the mulberry tre " (1 Chron. 14 : 15)—an awakening of the church t of its slumbering—is recognizable in many parts the earth. We can confidently look and pra for a new and overpowering work of "the Lord, th Holy Spirit," as "a consuming fire" (Heb. 12 : 25-) to shake not the earth only but also heaven (th orld and the church). We can regard this present r as but "the beginning of travails" (Matt. 24 : and take courage. We may look up with bright hope and confidence for a new birth of faith and lo , repentance and power, in preparation for the co ng of that time when the Saviour, as "King of king and Lord of lords," will shepherd all the nations.

The Unifying Power of Common Sorrow

SUNDAY, September 3. Rev. 1 : 9. "Your companion in tribulation." There are many things in life which act as the promoters of a deep or superficial union. Sometimes the ergence of a common interest draws sundered ls into fellowship. "And the same day Pilate al Herod were made friends together." Sometimes t riveting bond is a common prejudice. More rely but more profoundly the welding minister is a mon joy. But deepest and most vital of all is t union which is born out of common grief. When erything else has left moody and resentful souls in hilling isolation, they are sometimes brought into hared affliction, and the baptism of sorrow quick- their torpid affinities and makes them all akin. enter our troubles as a mob, we emerge as a family.

or one thing, we instinctively draw together in t darkness. We are like sheep which huddle to- gher in the storm. We feel the comfort of one other's presence. It is said that one explanation of t massed advances of soldiers is the courage and ral sustenance which come from touching one other in the fight. Be that as it may, this craving f fellowship in crises is surely a native instinct of t heart, and there is an inevitable softening of ulsion and indifference when we are on the same d together in the blackness of the night.

But there is another reason for the consolidating istry of common grief. Grief has a strange power removing the seals from our eyes, the impeding aracts which have formed in the garish day. We ome more sensitive to one another's virtues and sensitive to one another's faults. Many of our ish prejudices fall away. Our heated resentments l into genial good-will. Our differences shrink. And this extraordinary thing happens: we are more arly revealed to one another when the darkness s upon us than we were in the high noon. We in to know each other better when the mists have hered about us. We become more gentle in our tionships, and every added tenderness is the dium through which we make richer discoveries l.

Who knows, therefore, what living unities are ng woven even in these dark days, so full of calam- and woe to many? The flowers are rotting, but of the rottenness may come the flax, the strands ich shall make a stronger fabric and a more en- ring union. In the realm of common sorrow much aving goes on in the night. Companionships are de in tribulation. And the companions in tribu- lion often move together into the fellowship of our rd. There is a certain awe in the darkness. The l gets a little thinner. The unseen and eternal s its pressure upon us. Enter, God! J. H. J.

God Our Unfailing Helper

MONDAY, September 4. Ex. 15 : 22-27. "And Moses cried unto the Lord." How much better s than to reprimand the people, or threaten to ow up his commission, or give way to pessimism d despair! The disciples of John, when they had ried their beloved leader, went and told Jesus; d in all ages the servants of God have been glad to n from their discouragements and the ingratitude those for whom they would gladly have laid down ir lives, to Him whose heart is open to every moan, d whose tender mercies are over all his works.

What a lesson Moses was learning day by day of ating God as his living partner, on whom must t the heavy end of that extraordinary pilgrimage ough the waterless waste! God must indeed have n a living reality to him, because he took every cumstance as it arose into the secret place of the ost High. It was thus that he learnt the ways of d. We are expressly told that "he made known ways unto Moses." And as he found that at each w appeal God manifested the saving strength of right hand, there must have grown up an intimacy tween the human and the divine which tended to solute union.

But the doors of such a life stand open to each of us. e one dread specter of our lives is Fear. We fear pursuit of the past, the demands of the present. menace of the future. We feel that we cannot stain the burdens that providence has imposed on . It seems as though we were standing with our ck to a wall and with failing strength parrying the saults of our foes, whereas each jolt of the road, ch wry word, each threatening peril should drive to the heart of God, with a cry. He waits for us to treat him as our everlasting resource in each episode of life's stern ordeal. F. B. M.

The Man Who Encourages

TUESDAY, September 5. Isa. 41 : 6. "They helped every one his neighbor: and every one said to his brother, Be of good courage." Religion is not an invisible and unwordly thing; it is in part at least the possession of the man who encourages and helps on his brother in the humdrum daily tasks of life.

Solomon says: "A man hath joy by the answer of his mouth; and a word spoken in due season, how good it is! The pure speak pleasant words." Again he says: "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in a network of silver."

Did you ever hear one say, "I don't know why, but I'm never at my best with that person?" There are some people who seem to carry about with them almost unconsciously an atmosphere of negative faultfinding. You see them coming and you cross the street to avoid meeting them. They seldom carry good tidings. They can always be depended upon to point out the difficulties and to see the faults. One such person of my acquaintance knows his darkening tendency on a company, and he said once, "I suppose God made me and others like me to be danger-signals." Yet it may be well to remember that one danger signal is enough for a whole train, and also that danger signals are not needed to be used, as the general rule, on good roads.

The Bible makes it a Christian duty as well as a means of moral and spiritual growth to give encouragement and scatter health and joy as widely as possible. We little know how near our dearest friend or neighbor may be to despair, for he often masks it with a smile. An adverse remark from us may be the "last straw," while a breath of kindly appreciation would lift him upon the wings of new hope. Let us be encouragers! C. S. C.

The Prevailing Power of Prayer

WEDNESDAY, September 6. Ex. 17 : 1-16. "And Moses, Aaron, and Hur went up to the top of the hill." In earlier years Moses would not have thought of winning a battle save by force of arms. He has now learnt that he can win it by prayer. From the mountain-top he surveyed the battle, and stretched out his hands in prayer, that is, he fought with unseen combatants the livelong day, and won the victory by his intercessions, of which those upborne arms were the symbol. It is a most beautiful and instructive picture. Three old men in prayer! Two staying up the third!

More things may be wrought by prayer than men suppose. Probably this was to Paul the great lesson of his imprisonments. At first they sorely chafed his eager spirit. He had been accustomed to gird himself and go where he would without hindrance. But all this was arrested by the Roman handcuffs. Perhaps, at first, he felt his power to help the churches he had founded was ended; and then he suddenly discovered a leverage by which he could secure greater results than ever; and henceforth each epistle contains a reference to his prayers. "I never cease to make mention of you in my prayers."

According to our prayers are our successes in Christian service. Let us then fill our Rephidims with strong crying and tears, and our spiritual foes, like Amalek, will be unable to prevail. We are overcome in personal experience and in our service because we expend ourselves unduly in activity and leave so small a space for prayer. What deliverances we might win for our dear ones and all others molested by the flesh, if we spent more time on the hill-top with the rod of prayer in our hands! F. B. M.

The Boundaries of the Christian

THURSDAY, September 7. Rev. 14 : 4. "These are they that follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth." John tells us of his vision of the hundred and forty and four thousand who had the name on their foreheads, who sang the new song, and who were also characterized by the fact that they follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth.

There is a suggestion here for those who would have a simple boundary of the Christian life, who would know where they can go and what they can do as members of the Church of God. The rule would be: "Go anywhere and do anything in which you can follow Christ."

The boundary of the life of the Christian is not one of space but of spirit. They who are His can go wherever they can carry or find the spirit of Christian sacrifice and love. The test is the motive that dominates our hearts. The determining question is: "What are the thoughts of my heart?" There is no place that may not be the gate of heaven to our souls if we carry the heavenly spirit in our minds and acts.

Think of the varied places where Jesus went, making every one a veritable house of God. Nazareth was consecrated by his working youth, Cana by the wedding he attended, the wilderness by his temptation, the Garden of Gethsemane by his prayer, the hillsides by his contact with the Jewish multitudes, Bethany by his adaptation to home life, Jerusalem by his triumphal entry, and Calvary by the shadow of his cross. He wrestled with every form of fortune and was himself in scenes of festivity, poverty, merrymaking or sorrow. It was not the place he visited but the atmosphere about him that made the difference. The world, with its multifold activities and changeful scenes, was his altar of sacrifice.

The Christian has been named a "follower." What does that word "follower" mean? When we think of whom we are following, the matter of place solves itself. C. S. C.

Nearness to God in Prayer

FRIDAY, September 8. Ex. 18 : 13-27. "Be thou for the people Godward." This phrase opens up a very interesting vista of service for us, especially for those who exercise the right of entrance to the Divine Presence. We can imagine Moses going to God each day with long lists of questions and requests for one and another of that vast needy host. He would mention names and wants, reasons and arguments, and wait for the message to carry back. He realized his partnership with the Most High and that they had a common interest in the people.

We often wonder at Luther, who spent three hours each day in prayer and meditation; at Bishop Andrewes, who spent the greater part of five hours each day in fellowship with God; at John Welsh, who thought that day ill spent which did not witness eight or ten hours of closest communion. It may seem to our casual thought that such prolonged praying must involve an endless monotony of vain repetitions. We forget that when men are sent to the big city with a host of commissions from their neighbors and friends, they must needs tarry longer than when they go only for themselves. It would be a very blessed experience for us, if the needs of others detained us for longer periods before God than our own needs demanded. Thus our Saviour pleads for his people and the world. When we have a matter, let us take it to him. He asks for us Godward, and will bring our causes to the Source of all Power and Love. He will also show us the way wherein we must walk and the work we must do. This is what he meant in saying "Abide in me." F. B. M.

Jesus, Sovereign and Saviour

SATURDAY, September 9. John 4 : 26. "Jesus saith unto her, I that speak unto thee am He." Jesus, as the eternal Son of God, forgave sins and healed the sick. He received sinners as the divine Saviour and accepted worship as God. He commanded lost men to follow him as their only hope of salvation. He abolished death, brought life and immortality to light. He put away the ceremonial laws and interpreted the Ten Commandments, saying, "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life; I am the end of the law. Come unto me and I will give you rest."

"If you are ashamed of me, I will be ashamed of you before my Father and the holy angels." No other name is worthy to be mentioned beside the name of Jesus. Moses was but a child beside the bush of fire, John the Baptist but a boy running along the dusty road, crying, "Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world." Luther was but the hand of Jesus, opening anew the fountains of liberty and truth; Lincoln, only his index finger pointing to liberty for the captive; Robert Raikes his errand boy to gather in the children; William Taylor, one little ray of light from the Sun of Righteousness, illuminating all dark continents. These, among the noblest of mortals, are like the stars in the heavens,

"singing as they shine,
The hand that made us is divine."

We are creatures, thou the Creator. Thou remainest, and thy years shall not fail. E. W. C.

BACK FROM THE ARCTIC. The southern party of the Stefansson Arctic Expedition returned to Nome, Alaska, August 16, having completed its work. The expedition has surveyed the coast line from Cape Barry to Stapleton Bay, and from there to the mouth of the Rae River, which has been surveyed for seventy-five miles from its mouth. Geological surveys have been made along the coast and along the Rae, Kogluktualuk and Copper Mine Rivers. Much copper-bearing rock was found, and over 150 islands were mapped and charted. Phonograph records of the dance songs and folklore of the Eskimos, with careful transcriptions and translations, have been made, the customs and games of the Eskimos have been studied, the life history of a number of rare arctic insects has been worked out, deep-sea dredging and soundings have been made, and the expedition brought back photographs and moving pictures of native life and scenery and about a thousand specimens of birds and mammals. Vilhjalmur Stefansson, with the balance of the expedition, is remaining in the arctic in order to explore further the land discovered last summer.

SELF-GOVERNMENT FOR PHILIPPINES. On August 16 the Senate approved the conference report on the Philippine Bill by a vote of 37 to 22. The Clark amendment, guaranteeing independence within four years, was eliminated from the measure. The present Philippine commission was abolished by the bill, the electorate is increased from about 200,000 Filipinos to 800,000, and this increased electorate is to choose a senate. The office of governor-general is retained, and the post of vice-governor created. Functions of the legislature are limited, acts regarding coinage, currency and immigration to receive the approval of the President of the United States. Americans in the islands who wish to vote must become citizens of the Philippine Islands.

SCIENTIFIC EXPEDITION TO ALASKA. Mr. and Mrs. Louis Shortridge, Alaskan Indians educated in mission schools, will head an expedition financed by John Wanamaker, and under the direction of the University Museum in Philadelphia, which will search for ethnological specimens in Alaska.

MADERO REPATRIATED. Francisco Madero, Sr., father of the murdered president of Mexico, announced recently that the Carranza government had granted amnesty to the Madero family and had restored property which had been seized in northern Mexico.

MUST NOT DISCRIMINATE. On August 12 the Interstate Commerce Commission declared that freight rates within a state which discriminate in favor of points within the state as against equally distant points outside the state were in conflict with the Federal laws and must not be maintained.

RAISE FIRST SUBMARINE. Residents of Paterson, N. J., have perfected plans for raising from the bottom of the Passaic River what is said to be the first submarine boat. It was tried out in the river in 1887, made one successful dive, and then sank to the bottom of the river, where it has remained. The model was constructed from old boiler plate by John P. Holland, who was then a teacher in a Paterson school. This is not the historic Holland submarine. The torpedo-boat Holland, the first successful submarine of the United States navy, is now on exhibition at the Commercial Museum, Philadelphia, and has recently been purchased from the government because of the intention of the Navy Department to have it broken up. It will be kept permanently on exhibition in the Museum of Peaceful Arts in New York City.

A HIGHER LOAF. The convention of the National Association of Master Bakers, which met last week in Salt Lake City, gave considerable attention to a proposition for nation-wide increase in the price of bread, the bakers insisting that if the rising price of wheat forced a similar increase in the price of flour, it would be impossible to maintain the five-cent loaf at its present weight and price. It was stated that the ten-cent loaf would still be marketed without change. Chairman Hurley of the Federal Trade Commission immediately instituted an investigation into the whole wheat and baking situation. The Federal District Attorney in Chicago had already uncovered considerable evidence tending to show conspiracy between big milling interests and grain operators to manipulate the wheat market. Mr. Hurley and the District Attorney in Chicago will work together. It is stated that while the wheat crop this year will probably be under 700,000,000 bushels, it will nevertheless exceed the nation's requirements. About 160,000,000 bushels have been carried over from last year's crop, and the country will have at least 200,000,000 bushels for export if the market for it exists. During the past crop year about 245,000,000 bushels have been exported.

Army Bill Vetoed. On August 18 President Wilson vetoed the army appropriation bill because in revising the articles of war a clause had been inserted exempting retired army officers from all forms of military discipline. The President considered this clause unconstitutional. The bill was immediately reintroduced into the House with the revision of the articles of war omitted.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE really important events—that is events which prepare the way for and lead to subsequent happenings—of the past week have taken place on the Russian frontier in Europe and in the Caucasus, and hence we will devote our summary largely to these two fronts.

The Russian front at present in Europe may be roughly divided into three parts, the northern beginning at Riga on the shores of the Baltic and running as far south as Pinsk, in the middle of the Rokitno swamp, also known as the Pripet marsh, a swamp or marsh of as great area as Ireland, which extends east and west across the battle line.

In this northern portion of this front little outside of the ordinary fighting has taken place in the week (August 11–17) under review, and consequently there are no modifications to note of the battle line.

From Pinsk to the northeastern border of Galicia is what may be termed the central part of the line, which embraces within its limits the districts of Kolki, Dubno and Lutsk, which have during the past three months been the scenes of such hard and desperate fighting. Here the Russians were able during the first two months to drive their opponents considerably west of Lutsk, recovering the two fortresses of Dubno and Lutsk, together with considerable other territory between Lutsk and the line of the Stochod River. The ultimate objective of this Russian advance was the city of Kovel, but although for some time the Russians have been making every effort to pierce the Teutonic lines on the west bank of the Stochod, they have been unable to do so. During the past week the same unavailing effort on the part of the Russians has continued, but though making every sacrifice to do so, they have been unable to make any permanent breach in that wall, which still raises itself unbroken between the Russians and Kovel. The fighting, however, has been of the fiercest description, and the casualties on both sides are reported to have been very large.

The southern part of the Russian battle line begins at the northern border of Galicia and extends southward through that Austrian province. In this sphere of action during the past week the Russians have made gains of great importance which distinctly advance them toward their objective, the city of Lemberg, and indeed make it reasonably certain that if equal progress is made by them during the coming week, that city will fall into their hands shortly thereafter.

This Galician front may be divided in its turn into three sections: a northern one extending along the east and west line of the Sereth River; an eastern, which up to the beginning of this week followed the line of the Strypa River, which flows north and south; and a southern, following, heretofore, the east-and-west-flowing Pruth River.

During the past week the Russians have succeeded, in spite of a strong defensive by the Teutons, in crossing the Sereth River line at many points and establishing themselves in advantageous positions, which now appear to be the probable bases from which a further advance southward toward Lemberg will be made.

The Russians have also made other and far more important gains on the eastern front. This front, as before said, ran, until the beginning of this week, along the west bank of the Strypa River, and had done so all winter. During the past week the Russians launched another series of attacks along the whole length of the line, before whose strength the Austrian defense crumbled. The result was that, after several days' hard fighting, the Russians not only forced their way across the whole line of the Strypa River and took complete possession of its western bank, but they also drove the Austrians, in a rather disordered retreat, a full eighteen miles westward to and over the Zlota Lipa, another river which, running north and south, roughly parallels the Strypa.

On the southern line the Russian advance was equally important. Stanislau, the important railroad center in southeastern Galicia, whose capture by the Russians was mentioned as highly probable in last week's article, passed into their possession in the early days of the present week, and this capture enabled the Russian forces to advance immediately to the northward toward Halicz on the Dniester, which place, both by reason of its situation and of its fortifications, is the most important defense Lemberg possesses to the southeast.

Halicz is situated on the Dniester, here a stream of great width, which runs rather swiftly in a deep self-dug channel, somewhat resembling in this particular the rivers of our own Western states. The northern bank of this sort of canyon is considerably higher than the southern, and with this northern bank in possession of an enemy supplied with artillery, the crossing of the river becomes extremely difficult for an army moving from the south. But in the present case this difficulty is somewhat lightened by the fact that further to the east along this southern line the Russians have been able not only to advance their line to the south bank of the Dniester, but at points to cross that stream and establish themselves on its northern bank. So that it is in their power, not only to attack the Dniester crossing at Halicz from the south, but also to move forces westward along the north bank of the Dniester, and attack the defenders of the Halicz crossing from the east simultaneously with the attack from the south, which series of maneuvers will probably take place, and it seems highly probable will be rather speedily successful.

The Russians have another reason than the obvious military and political ones for desiring to have Lemberg firmly in their hands. For many years the Russian opponents of the Russian Orthodox Church, the various dissenting sects, have made Lemberg the center from which they directed their agitation to prevent the forcible incorporation of these various dissenting sects into the Orthodox Church, and consequently the Holy Synod would be well satisfied to break up this center of opposition.

In Bukowina the conditions do not appear to have been greatly changed during the past week. Here the Teutonic forces appear even to be making slight headway in the south, and it is from here that if Lemberg is to be saved, the Teutonic movement northward to save it by turning the Russian flank will be launched.

The Society of War Studies of Copenhagen, Denmark, a body of professional men formed for the study of all phases of the war, have issued an estimate of the casualties of all the belligerents to August 1, 1916. This runs as follows: Belgium, 200,000; Serbia, 400,000 Italy, 280,000; Montenegro 32,000 British Empire, 827,000; France, 2,400,000; Russia, 7,800,000; Austria, 2,800,000, Germany, 3,100,000, Bulgaria, 10,000; Turkey, 200,000 Japan, 1,500, making the appalling total of 18,080,000. This society also estimates that the total of the debt created by the war now reaches approximately ninety-four billion dollars!

There was some fighting without important result during the week on the northern border of Greece.

On the Suez Canal front there has been more fighting this past week. The Turks whom the British defeated in this region last week showed unexpected power of resistance, and, assuming in their turn the offensive northeast of Romani, drove back the British cavalry launched in their pursuit.

In the Caucasus the trend of events is decidedly adverse to the Russians. The long-continued advance of the Turkish right wing in western Persia has finally affected seriously the Russian center, more particularly as the Turks have opened a formidable attack on that portion of the Russian line. The Turkish left wing has now driven the Russians back well on to two hundred miles, and has also begun a lateral attack while continuing the frontal, by which lateral attack "the rolling up" of the Russian right wing is seriously threatened. During the past week the Russians have been driven north of Hamadan, Bijur and Sain Caliph, so that the right of the Turkish left wing has now reached the southern shores of Lake Urumiah.

In the center the Turks have made equally rapid progress. Koshan to the east of Lake Van has fallen into their hands, and Van itself is seriously menaced. Bitlis and the southern shore of Lake Van have been retaken, while to the west of the lake Mush has been recaptured and the Turkish columns are now closing in on Gum Gum or Kum Kum, to the north of Mush, and its recapture seems highly probable. It now seems quite possible that unless the Russians find means to stop the advance of the Turkish center immediately, they will be obliged to evacuate their recent conquest, Ersingan, and fall back to the east to concentrate their army for the defense of Erzerum.

The Italians had the misfortune to lose one of their finest and newest battleships, Leonardo de Vinci, 22,000 tons, during the past week, through an explosion of its magazine. About three hundred men were lost in this catastrophe.

The western front was very quiet as a whole all the week. Bad weather was apparently the chief contributing cause of this quietness. On the British portion of the Picardy front there was, however, some very hard fighting to the northwest and north of Pozières, where the Australians made a few hundred yards' advance, lost the territory thus won by a counter-attack, and finally, again attacking, won the ground for the second time. Only very minor fighting with unimportant results took place on the rest of the British front. Farther south, on the French portion of the front, the French made a gain of a couple of hundred yards near Maurepas, and held this gain against rather strong counter-attacks. South of the Somme the French pushed a little distance to the east from Estrées.

In the Verdun region there was very little infantry fighting, and the end of the week found the combatants in practically the same positions as they were at the beginning. The rest of the western front was quiet.

On the Austro-Italian front interest centers in the attempts of the Italians to advance southeastward from the Isonzo line toward Trieste. From Gorizia eastward toward the Wippach line the Italians have not moved as rapidly as they hoped, the extent and difficulty of the Austrian defenses being greater than they expected. On the Dobardo plateau, however, southeast of Gorizia, they have cleared the country to the eastward as far as the first line of Austrian defenses. Southeast of Monfalcone they made little or no progress.

The President and the Strike

GOVERNMENT intervention has taken hold of the railroad strike situation. When the first intimation went out from Washington that President Wilson would receive the representatives of the roads and the brotherhoods, the matter immediately assumed a new aspect. The third party in interest—the People of the United States—had asserted the right to be heard concerning a movement which, if carried out to its fullest extent, would tie up the greater part of the business of the country. In assuming the rôle of pacificator, President Wilson undertook one of the most delicate tasks his administration has yet had to face; but that step once taken, there could be little doubt of the result. The friendly advice of the government could go to a certain extent. Beyond that point, if unheeded, it would cease to appeal, but would direct the situation in the public interest.

Railroads are an index of a nation's prosperity. A huge increase in the volume of business, during these two years of the European War, has brought phenomenal profits to the roads and swelled their dividends. Right in the midst of this war boom, which is reflected in every branch of commerce and industry, came the threat of a strike on a scale so vast that it would have paralyzed land transportation traffic, demoralized the marketing of the harvests, and cut off a large part of the food supplies of the country. It would have spelled ruin for many interests. Labor has its rights and capital also; but the rights of the whole people, when they are seriously involved, are paramount. The wage question, the eight-hour question, the dividend question, the over-time pay question and all others must sink into insignificance when the nation's interests are vitally involved, as in the present case.

The American public is essentially fair-minded. It has no desire to see either side take advantage of the other. It believes in fair wages and reasonable hours for the worker, precisely as it believes in justice for the employer; but the threatened strike would have involved the wreck of other interests on such a wide scale that to permit it would be little short of a crime. Hence, it has become the duty of the government to employ all the powers at its disposal to avert the strike. At this writing, indications point toward a peaceful solution of the situation. The President has held conferences with the leaders of both sides. The railroads have agreed to accept the principle of the eight-hour day, leaving all questions of detail for final adjustment by a competent tribunal.

It is possible that some of the brotherhoods may still be recalcitrant, as they proved two years ago, when a similar situation arose. At that time President Wilson gave some advice, which is equally pertinent now, appealing to their patriotism and regard for the public welfare to make whatever sacrifice was necessary to avert a national disaster.

Museums and Educators

MORE light has been shed on the early history of the human race within the last twenty-five or thirty years than in all the preceding centuries.

In a room in the museum of the University of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia, there is a remarkable statue of a Greek boy, carved by some unknown artist 2,300 years ago. It is only a fragment, but its lines are beautiful and true to nature. In another room is a stone lamp which lighted somebody's house in Crete more than 5,000 years ago. Near by is a small wooden tablet which was dug out of a tomb in Egypt, and the crude but still decipherable hieroglyphics tell that the occupant of the tomb—some man of distinction in that far-off time—lived 4,000 years before the Christian era. In still another part of the museum is a case containing an ax of flint, roughly fashioned, which was dug up on the banks of the river Seine, and belonged in the remote Stone Age, long before metal was in use. Think of this tool or weapon, made in primeval times, being found on the site of Paris, probably the most representative city of our modern civilization!

It is worth while to go through these wonderful museums. We have them in New York, in Philadelphia, in the Yale collection at New Haven, the wonderful display in the British Museum, and in the priceless memorials of antiquity in Paris, Berlin, Vienna and Cairo. In our own country there are now some six hundred museums, many of them still comparatively small, but all of inestimable worth as educators of the people. From them we learn what the artist and the craftsman could accomplish, long before written history, and before any city now standing was built.

The thought that impresses itself strongly on the museum visitor is the remoteness of the beginnings of the race. The Bible, it will be remembered, uses that significant yet simple expression, "In the beginning." Nowhere does it tell us that man was created six thousand years ago. These figures, which have fixed themselves in the human mind until they have become a popular misapprehension, were the result of the calculations of a distinguished literary Episcopal prelate, Archbishop Ussher, living in the sixteenth century, who, reckoning back from the beginning of the Christian era, divided the periods of recorded history as far back as 4004 B. C., and stopped there, having no further data on which to proceed. The science of archeology, with its wonderful explorations, since that time has reached back thousands of years farther, tracing the existence of human life to far remoter periods. Nor is its task ended, for the locked-up secrets of still more distant ages beckon to the skilled investigator.

The further back we go in research, the more we are impressed with the wisdom of the beneficent Creator and the strange order of the development of this wonderful world in which we live.

The Empty Pew Problem

WHEREVER the problem of the decline in church attendance is seriously considered, one of the points upon which ministers and church boards are everywhere agreed is that the growing use of the automobile has added to the difficulties of a very trying situation. But is it the wisest policy to rail at a usage which might be made a help rather than a hindrance to church-going? We find the hostile attitude adopted in not a few religious publications. Here for instance is the Living Church, an Episcopalian journal of Milwaukee, which personifies the Sunday autoist as "Mr. Somebody," and over his head, as the representative of his pleasure-loving class, it reads a caustic little homily to other Sabbath-breakers:

> You ride by, Mr. Somebody, on a Sunday morning, with your gay family, in your august touring car that costs you more for its maintenance in a month than you give for the spread of the Gospel throughout all the world in three years. Why can't you run your car up to the door of the homely little church, help your wife and family to alight, and take a real, sympathetic part in the homely worship that those homely farmer-folk are offering within its walls? Why don't you give some encouragement to the village missionary who is seeking to make bricks without straw in that rural community? His sermons wouldn't be so prosy if he had reason to believe that a few new listeners—people of such splendid intellectual caliber as you, Mr. Somebody—would drive up occasionally in their cars and take an intelligent part in the service. You could show a heart full of sympathy with the few people and the tired pastor who are keeping the doors of that little church open Sunday by Sunday, if not day by day.

All of which is unquestionably true; but we seriously doubt whether such an appeal is going to remedy the situation. If the autoist is to be won back to the church, it can hardly be accomplished by chiding and chafing. One of our best-known evangelists, who never lacks a good-sized audience, frankly declares that there is another side to the question, and that the experience of sitting in a hot, ill-ventilated church in midsummer for an hour and a half or more, and listening to a tedious exposition of dogmatic theology has perhaps more to do with the trouble than people are willing to admit. Such a church need not be surprised if the world wins away some of the weaker ones of the flock. It is not so, however, with the church that rises to the situation, whose minister gives the best that is in him every time he preaches, counting himself as nothing, if only he may deliver an inspiring Gospel message of cheer, comfort and encouragement; the church in which the songs of Zion are so sweetly rendered that every one feels it a privilege and a pleasure to join in the praise tribute. The Lord's house to such a congregation is not a dull, gloomy place, but a delightful retreat, cool, flower-decked, inviting. The humblest edifice can thus be transformed with a little loving care. One feels that in such a church the seed is not sown in vain.

We can conceive of a church to which the motor car might prove an adjunct rather than an obstacle—a church whose parish has been extended over what was untouched territory before auto-going days. There are doubtless many such churches. The children of light should not be surpassed in wisdom by the children of this world. They should make the church attractive to motorists from far and near, and provide sheds a-plenty. In such a church, all alive and with every agency at work, there will be little caus or complaint of empty pews on the Lord's Day.

Did It Ever Strike You?

THAT there are 23,000,000 professing C stians of the evangelical faith in the Ur ed States, whose combined influence, concentr ed on a single purpose, would be practically irresisti e?

That if these 23,000,000 Christians, or even ha of their number, were loyal to their profession of f h and sincerely desirous of advancing Christ's king m on earth, they could become the mightiest agenc or the inbringing of souls that the world has ever kn n.

That while the tasks before Christianity today re great and urgent, there is not one of them impos le of accomplishment, if the Christians of Ame a believed what they profess, and carried into the M ster's service the same zeal, energy and confidence y show in their everyday business.

That every one of the 23,000,000 Christians o prays "Thy kingdom come" has a direct indivi al responsibility to do all that lies within his or er power for the spiritual, moral and material welfa of our fellow beings.

Now is the greatest, the most urgent time for s ice that God's people have ever known. No one sh ld idle away these precious days. Break down all e barriers of selfishness and sloth. Link yourself h other Christians in a chain for earnest, organ ed effort. No matter how small your influence, how o scure your station, or how slender your means, you n help to make the world a better place to live i y bringing the Christ spirit into it.

We want every member of the Christian He ld Family to think over these things, and then to t action follow thought; for in His service there is g at reward.

"Benefits Forgot"

IN a little incident, which appears in a cont porary, many readers will recognize a fam ar picture. It is that of the old minister who, a er giving all of the best years of his life to the wor is at last dropped as of no more use for active ser e, and—utterly unprovided for.

The old preacher had served his church exa y forty-six years. There had been days in the e y part of his pastorate when other churches had r gently beckoned to him, but he had been unwillin o leave the people to whom he was devotedly attac d. And his work had been efficient unto the very d. Most of the members had known no other pas r. He had buried the dead, had said the words w h established new homes, had been the friend of e boys and remained their friend when they had gr n into manhood, and had taken the places left va nt by their fathers. But now the end had come. C n scientiously the old man, now seventy-five, had d down the burden.

> A friend remarked to him: "Now that you have retire of course provision of some kind has been made for your ld age?"
> "No, I can't say that there has," said the old min er slowly. "Somehow I have not been able to save any mon ."
> "And we all know the reason why," laughed the other, o was a railroad conductor. "Everybody in trouble came fi of all to you. Now, honestly, did you ever turn any one a y empty handed?"
> "I cannot just say as to that," stammered the old man.
> "Well, I can; but what I want to know is, hasn't the ch h or denomination made any provision for you now that u must give up active work?"
> The old man shook his head and did not speak.
> "That's a shame! That's a disgrace!" said the condu r. "I have been with this road only twenty-three years, and xt November I shall retire, and the company will pay n a pension as long as I live."
> "And I am glad," said the old man.
> "So am I—for myself; but what I cannot understand is y the Christian Church, whose members sometimes find a g at deal of fault with the railroads because they think they ar ot altogether fair in their dealings, should fall so far behind e despised corporation in dealing with the men who have se d it faithfully. Do you know, dominie? Can you explain it?"
> The old minister shook his head as he said slowly, "Per s they have not thought of it in that way."

Not thought of it! We provide for our old dom c servants who have given us the best of their li s; we set aside a substantial love-gift for the found g we adopt; we find homes for the aged, for worn- t friends who have been victims of misfortune. e would never turn the old family horse or even the g out of doors. W ld's Greatest Telescope

AF R three years' work the largest lecting telescope mirror in the orld s ready for installation at the rne e Observatory on Mount Wilson, lo. Astronomers expect that a hun ed llion stars hitherto unknown will re aled by the new mirror, which 10 inches in diameter, 40 inches ger than any before used. The ge ass disk, weighing four and a half tons, was cast by the St. Gobain Company of Paris. A concrete base for the telescope has been installed, and the road to the summit of the mountain has been widened to permit the carrying of the parts to their place. It is a comfort to think that even during the world war the belligerents have time for scientific pursuits. While the Paris firm has been making this contribution to scientific efficiency, there is in Berlin the twenty volume catalogue, listing and describing some 300,000 stars, which has taken hundreds of astronomers the last sixty-five years to compile. There should be a deep kinship in truth-seekers the world over, and this will reassert itself when the present clouds have rolled away. How God's great creative majesty unfolds under the eye of the telescope! Men devised this kind of glass the better to see the few stars that were already visible to the naked eye, and expected at once to chart the heavens with ease. Indeed, some thought that they would be able to wrest their secrets of the skies. But the result was far different. With the increased powers of the telescope, more and ever more stars leap into sight, until the human mind staggers and quails before the millions of worlds that present themselves to its thought. Our Father's hand holds them all in their courses: "Mine hand also hath laid the foundation of the earth, and my right hand hath spanned the heavens." (Isa. 48 : 13.)

German Prisoners' Model Village

THE picture shows a German village built on the property of the United States government at Portsmouth, Va. Every house in it was constructed by the crews of the interned German cruisers Prinz Eitel Friedrich and Kronprinz Wilhelm. From every standpoint it is a model village, with its cozy houses, its pretty lawns, yards and flowers, and its look of peace and happiness in contrast to the ugly looks of the two interned greyhounds of war. There are seventy-five houses, built on the German model, and all were put up by the interned seamen. They were constructed out of scrap lumber discarded by the United States government, and from boxes in which goods were shipped to the German vessels. Each house is of perfect construction, with several windows and a chimney. For some time after they were built they had to remain unpainted, for this village went up without an appropriation or a budget. But one day an order came for the repainting of the two cruisers by the German government, and by carefully saving all the scrapings of the old paint the men were able to reclaim enough material to paint their own homes. Around each house is a fence, which is in every case of an artistic design and adds greatly in setting off the house. There is ample room for yards, and in some can be seen chickens, ducks and geese. Besides the houses there is quite a garden, chicken farm and athletic field. The garden is filled with vegetables good to eat, and the chicken farm is a model of cleanliness. We admire the pluck of these unfortunate men who found themselves by the fortunes of war doomed to a long imprisonment in an alien country. To this spirit of enterprise and contentment every circumstance of life must yield, for after all it is not the outward things but the heart of peace and industry that makes for happiness. In the midst of the greatest hardships the great apostle was able to say: "Not that I speak in respect of want, for I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content." (Phil. 4 : 11.)

Dry Chicago Federation

REALIZING the power of enlightened public opinion on moral questions, the Dry Chicago Federation has set out to make a canvass of the entire population of the city for signers to a petition against the saloon. A call has been made for 10,000 volunteer canvassers, and in September a ten-day drive is to be made. The brewers are troubled, as may be seen by their advertising in the daily papers. They offer as a solution to the objectionable features of the liquor business the revoking of all licenses of saloons that have broken the law, and instead of total abstinence a campaign of temperance education. To this the Dry Federation has replied by challenging the brewers to cooperate in its program for decency in Chicago. The issue is joined, and it is to be hoped that the efforts of all Christians and temperance believers will not be relaxed until the grip of this terrific power is broken off the great city of Chicago. The cities are the last to surrender in this warfare against booze, and their conquest calls for the most stern and unrelenting courage, coupled with a hope that shall never fail. The Bible leaves no question as to which side is in the right: "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that puttest thy bottle to him and makest him drunken." (Hab. 2 : 15.)

Cotton Stalks for Paper

THAT the stalks of the cotton plant make a good substitute for wood in the manufacture of paper is the conclusion of the German testing bureau after thorough experiments. The cotton stalks on which the experiments were made came from Egypt, and yielded satisfactory results. Although this discovery will not be vital to Germany or the European states, it is of the most far-reaching importance to our country if it can be successfully put into effect. We have a cotton crop so great that this by-product may revolutionize the whole industry of paper-making. Dr. Charles J. Brand of our Department of Agriculture has for years been making a study of this subject, and has also demonstrated that cotton or corn stalks will make good paper. It now remains to perfect the process so that it will be cheaper than the present high cost of wood pulp. It is a curious thing that Egypt, the country of papyrus stalks and the first home of paper, should again furnish the materials for this new discovery. The Bible has many references to the uses of writing material. "Having many things to write, I would not write with paper and ink." (II John 12.)

False Advertising Illegal

THE first arrest under the new "false advertising" law of the District of Columbia has just been made. A customer bought some goods which were not as advertised, and as a result the secretary-treasurer of the store was arrested. This law is intended to punish those who by false or exaggerated representations through advertising induce people to buy their wares. The general cleaning up of advertising is a wholesome sign of the times; in the long run it will prove of financial advantage to all advertisers, but still better, it represents an improving public conscience as to commercial honesty. There is no permanent basis of dealing between individuals or nations other than honesty and uprightness. The invectives which the Hebrew prophets hurled against commercial dishonesty make first-rate campaign literature for every modern movement of commercial uplift and moral reform. "Shall I count them pure with the wicked balances and with the bag of deceitful weights?" (Micah 6 : 11.)

Boy Scouts Help Police

THE New York City Park Commissioner has called in the help of Boy Scouts in patrolling Central Park over the week-ends. With the extra crowds, and while the police have been needed to watch the strike situation, the lads in khaki have rendered valuable assistance in answering queries, guiding strangers and protecting the trees and turf. The Boy Scout movement has set out to develop the manly virtues of body and will by forest-craft and other outdoor activities, and the best use to which these can be put is the protection of the public. These lads are none too young to be learning the value of our civic institutions and to be taking up their responsibilities. "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth." (Lam. 3 : 27.)

Soldiers and the Bible

FRIENDS visiting the soldiers from New York City, gave one of them a bouquet and another a Bible. The one who had received the flowers was heard to remark, "I wish I had your book; I was wishing for something to read." Another soldier who had been given a Testament said, "I have been reading the New Testament. I never knew it was such an interesting book." The New York Bible Society has presented over 10,000 New Testaments to young men who have gone to camp or to the border. They have been eager to receive the book which "is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." (II Tim. 3 : 16.)

To Make Farm Life Attractive

By
O. H. PANNKOKE

WHAT can the country school do to save the rural community? The National Educational Association, which met in New York City a few weeks ago, was very strongly reminded of its duty and opportunity to preserve the backbone of the nation, the men and women that till the soil. Not only did a host of speakers of national importance devote their addresses to it, but the retiring president, Dr. Johnston, chose as the topic of his presidential address "The Rural Home and the Farm Woman." "Our people," he said, "are waking up to the vital importance of the rural problem to the welfare of the whole community." And in the discussion many speakers pointed to England, where a policy of neglecting the sturdy yeomanry of Goldsmith's day had resulted in gravest social suffering.

Talking with Dr. Johnston, I asked him: "What in your mind is the most promising element in this great gathering?" He suggested with a smile that it was rather a good-sized question, considering that upward of 40,000 were active members, among them the leaders of America's educational system. He said: "We are cutting away time-worn traditions and making education meet the needs and demands of life." "But aren't you afraid that this great cry for practical things will kill idealism and spiritual values?" "Not at all. A small group may tend towards materialism. For the great mass practical education means an applied idealism in useful service. It is a means to the higher things in life."

In that spirit this greatest gathering of teachers ever held in America approached the question of the country school. On the one hand it looked for practical results. On the other, it never lost sight of the higher values which education, especially in a democracy, must give.

The whole range of country life, with all its varied aims and interests, was made part of the discussion. It was held that the school is a vital part of every activity of the community. The place of the woman on the farm, scientific farming, social centers, school gardens, deserted farms, rural libraries, conservation of natural resources, extension training for grown people, and the host of other questions which have become so prominent in recent years, all found a place in the interests of the present day country schools. And last, but not least, an expert seriously discussed: "Pigs as Pets for Farm Boys."

Contrast lends perspective. Mrs. Anna Shaw supplied the background which strikingly set off the novelty of what these men and women were trying to do in reconstructing rural education. She told the story of her life on the frontier of Kansas a half-century ago. Her description of the pioneer women, these silent partners of the hardy frontiersmen in turning a wilderness into a garden, was pathetic, but only too true in some sections to our day. She said: "They left comfortable homes and pleasant communities for what? a bleak log-house and a wilderness. They had no chance for companionship. They never got away for a change. There is a reason why farmers' wives contribute a greater percentage to the insane asylums than any other class of the community." Mrs. Shaw then drew forth the laughter of the audience by describing her days as a country schoolma'm. She was herself only a girl, and her education was self-acquired. A single book had to serve the whole school. "But," she said, "we had a good time, and the teacher had the best time of all."

Dr. Johnston spoke at length on helping the farm woman in the business of her home. He pictured the home as the centre of the farm's activities. "The farm home is the beginning and the end of every day's work. It differs from the town home in this respect. It is an essential part of the farm business. If the farm home and the farm woman are not what they should be, the farm business cannot be what it should be." To make the farm home thus efficient he favored courses in home economics and the wider use of labor-saving devices and machinery to lighten the lot of the women. But these outward helps are but to serve the higher goal of "making country life socially satisfying." He felt that the country school is the natural rallying point from which the farm home must gain its inspiration as well as guidance. "It cannot neglect the health, the recreation nor t so ideals of the people."

Dr. Van Hise, president of Wisconsin U ers criticised severely schools that shut thems es from life and cater to the interests of smal ro He held that the university's "field of inve ga covers all of the practical problems of the s te, ricultural, industrial, political, social an m

Dr. Burritt expanded on the idea which r. Hise touched. He is State Leader of Farm ur in New York and as such directly concerned ith extension of agricultural teaching. The en works by getting the cooperation of the co nu through the organization of farmers' ass ati "If the work is to be permanent," said Dr ur "local initiative must be encouraged and deve ed local leadership further trained and conn ed with individuals of organizations in such a y the work will be continuous and effective.'

It was an ambitious program which th ser body of men and women set for themselve o the rural community. They, perhaps, best w great was the task and how little appreciati w come to them. Dr. Claxton, national Com ssi of Education, lent unity and foundation t plans in an address which ranked among th est livered at the convention. He spoke on "A ati System of Education." He first dwelt on e g discrepancies existing between the we sett wealthy Eastern states and the poor sta , W and South. He then pictured a system of uca where North and South and East and Wes ll h the same opportunity, where the child of e ba woods can start out in life with schooling as oro as the child in the metropolis. Then he d a ture of the wealth and future opportunit of nation and appealed that its resources be obili for the training of all its children in a syste of e cation truly American. "America must ke leadership of the world after the war," he ecla "In our schools are the citizens of the next g erat We make the future. As we make the epu so shall it be."

Start a Community Chorus

By GRACE HUMPHREY

THE community chorus is an outgrowth of the old-fashioned singing school. There the aims were to spread a knowledge of music and of sight reading, to make standard choral works familiar. The singing school was for young folks who had voices and could sing.

The community chorus welcomes this group, along with all the others. But it is primarily for the large numbers of men and women who have no opportunity to get any musical training, who have never had a musical lesson, who can't tell one note from another, who don't even know that they have voices.

In a community chorus there are almost as many men as women, an astonishing fact, as any choral class leader will tell you. All ages, all classes, white-haired grandmothers, factory boys, young shopgirls, working men and working women, blacksmiths, lawyers, trained musicians. Everybody is welcome, for the motto of the chorus is "Every one can sing, and if you doubt it, just come and try!"

Where is this chorus? In many towns, large and small. The first one began in Rochester two years ago. It was started by a man who began life as a mechanic in the Pittsburg mills, but with such an innate love of music that he sang while putting iron into the furnaces, and made his men sing with him. Later he studied music, and gradually came to believe that it was for everybody; not to be listened to when created by the isolated few marked off from their fellows, but to sing it for themselves.

In Rochester he saw a great crowd waiting to get in at a "mayor's concert." "Just the place for my people's chorus!" he said: "I'm going to get these folks to singing!"

"They won't come," the mayor discouraged him, when he asked permission, "and they won't sing if they do!"

"Only let me try. Everybody can sing!" was Harry Barnhart's reply.

At the next concert the ex-mechanic sang and the great audience joined in. They seemed to like it.

"Shall we do this again?" cried the leader. "All who want to, stand up." And over two hundred stood, the nucleus of the many community choruses existing today.

FOR the movement spread to neighboring towns, even to New York City, where skeptics said there was no community spirit and such a chorus was an impossibility.

There is never any voice testing for membership in the community chorus. No sight-reading examinations. Sit where you please, and sing what part you like. After a few rehearsals, it is not uncommon to see people changing seats, finding that they have misjudged their own voices. Each person must find himself, not have it decided for him by bass or tenor scales.

Technical training? That will take care of itself. At the very first "sing" the printed music is given out, and soon, how no one can say, people have taught themselves something of musical symbols. They lose their fear of technical marks, and learn a sufficient amount to be sure guides to their ears and eyes.

There is never any trash, never any ragtime, in the community chorus music. Songs especially fitted for chorus singing are comparatively rare. They must be vital, filled with the warmth and the depth of human life, gripping both singers and listeners. So much of the music used is old, some of it very old; and like many things that have stood the tests of time, it has a deep religious note. But the religion offends no one, whatever his race or creed. Handel's "Largo" and the "Heavens are Telli " fr "Creation" are as popular "Ha Hark, the Lark" or the " eaut Blue Danube." Mozart's Glor is sung as well as "Nancy e."

WHEREVER it has be start the chorus is in gre dema for all community acti ies. sings at fourth of July celebrations, at ou or c certs in the parks, and at Christmas tim In little town last year, it led the singing of e ca at the community tree, ending with "O Co e All Faithful." Everybody left the square si ing hymn, and as they went through the st ts could be heard for blocks.

Another town held a community Th ksgi service. No speeches, no sermon. The esid message was read. The chorus sang, with t audi joining in for "America." The offering v for federated charities, and for the first time e pe learned that their town had community sp t.

In still another place a chamber of com ree a reception to a hundred and fifty newly ural citizens. The community chorus sang "H e, S Home."

The fundamental difference between the nmu chorus and other choruses is that here th ingi not an end in itself, but the means to an l. W people sing together, week after week, y f themselves. They lose sight of social ar reli distinctions, and become a community.

All through history, leaders have consci sly use of this unifying power of music. Th han savages, the Crusaders' hymns, battle song Mo revival choruses, he mous stress that B y Sun puts on singing, a exa coming readily to nd. ty, based on bea y, r in joy, brotherhoo goo

It's an Ill Wind, Etc.

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

THE infantile paralysis spread over the city. Children, especially the chil- en the slums, were ric and carried away th ospitals. Many of em ver came back from e pitals. Wide-eyed reig mothers, with not ou command of English to ask questions, dragged eir tle ones away from the fascination of gutter ols nd garbage pails. . . . Death, the grimmest d death—the death that, merciless, mows down re bies—hung like a pall over the city.

I cn't realize the horror of the epidemic at first, do think that many of us did. Of course the adl s flamed out on the front page of every news- pe ut then headlines are—well, headlines. But e nt as I was driving, with a friend, not far from c skirts of a little town near my home, three n pped forth from the side of the road. They d antern with them and one motioned, authortiv, with his hand for us to stop. I wondered he were highway robbers. But we stopped.

Th man with the lantern stepped up to the side th ar. Whipping back his coat he showed us a he adge.

'G any children with yer?" questioned he.

We e alone, we told him. And then, prompted by io y, I asked:

'B why do you want to know?"

'In ntile paralysis," answered the man shortly. 's gainst the law for any one from the city to ne nter this township—with children. It's in the law. You see, the children might be m 'York—" He paused suggestively.

Th man behind him took up the story. "Yer 't too careful," he told us. "Every town has te en now. It's the only way to keep the de e out."

Th ext day, as I passed one of the railway stas ading out of the city, I noticed that many a s were plastered over it. I stopped to read , said very bluntly that nobody under sixteen ld e allowed to leave New York. I discovered, r, at the same placards decorated every exit n e city. And then, at last, I knew how terrible in had swept upon us.

H is the twenty-second year since the founding o Mont-Lawn. Every season has seen the a filled with children from the slums—pale e ldren who think that the country and heaven th very same place; weak little children who er new the meaning of health. We have enai d three thousand little visitors every year, th season Mont-Lawn had not much more than ne its hospitable doors when the epidemic set T e Mont-Lawn season opened with about 350 r chins on hand and the full staff of workers. b re all of the first company of little guests had n ace to another group the bars began to go up ve New York City and suburban towns. We ybe, forty small friends still at the Home n e health departments finally stopped intern ansportation of children. Because we had be the laws of the city we were left with a Home ir for children, and the children were utterly bl to come! It was unfortunate—more than rt ate. It was blank tragedy!

"Necessity," they say, "is the mother of invention." Well, it was a necessity for us to fill the empty shell of Mont-Lawn. And so, because we couldn't help the children, we hunted for some one that we could help. And so the upshot of the matter was that we invited girls—girls who are over sixteen—who work hard the year through in stores, offices, and factories, to spend their vacations with us. Many of the girls wouldn't have had vacations but for this. Many of them couldn't afford to leave the city that was sapping their strength and health and endurance.

I went up to the Home yesterday. I didn't want to go, and it was with very apparent reluctance that I boarded the train. "For," I reasoned to myself, "Mont-Lawn has always been called the Children's Paradise. Grown-up girls will take away the charm —that peculiar childish charm—of the place. When Dr. Klopsch painted 'I love God and little children' over the doorway he was thinking of little children, not grown girls!"

DID you ever start off anywhere expecting to be disillusioned? That's the way I started off, yesterday, to Mont-Lawn. It almost surprised me as I drove in through the great gate between the double row of tall trees to see that the place was apparently unchanged. The green lawns were not so child-dotted as they had been—the place was quieter . . . that was all. Far in the corner of the playground I saw the lucky forty children who had become marooned in Happyland. They were gleefully making something—something that proved, as I drew nearer, to be baskets. But I was used to seeing hundreds of kiddies on that playground, and the place seemed lonesome. Then—

It was nearly lunch-time, and as I stood watching the children I saw a long line of girls walking leisurely up the road. They were pretty girls with sunburned faces—girls ranging in age from sixteen to a possible twenty years. They were having a good time as they walked up the road, for I could hear the sound of their happy voices, punctuated, every few minutes, with gay laughter. I half turned to one of the "teachers" who stood near me. She answered my unspoken question.

"Yes," she said, "it's the girls. They take a walk every morning. Don't they look well? But you should have seen some of them—" She paused.

"Don't they look—happy?" I added.

Later on they told me how the girls spent their time during the day. The regular schedule is something like this:

Breakfast—an unusually large breakfast—comes first. Then a pleasant walk through the woods or along the river, a walk that lasts until dinner time; dinner (a mighty good dinner, for I had some—lots!—of it with them); an hour of rest and a cool shower bath; tennis, croquet, volley-ball, anything they want to do until supper, and then, after supper, a pleasant get-together party. The parties break up at eight-thirty; the girls are in bed, healthily tired and ready to sleep, by nine-thirty, and the lights are out at ten o'clock.

Contrast this with the daily routine of thousands of girls when they are in the city. Here it is:

Breakfast—a skimpy one—and a trip to the factory or store or office in a poorly ventilated, stuffy subway or elevated car. Hard work from eight-thirty till noon-time, with perhaps a half-hour off for lunch—which usually consists of a dry sandwich or crackers and watered milk, or a cheap soda from an inferior soda fountain. Work again until after five——sometimes later—and then the stuffy, poorly ventilated ride back to the small, tight, germy room that is, all too often, home. Supper—a slim delicatessen supper; cheap movies, maybe, and rest at last—such rest as one may snatch from the heat and noise of the city.

There is a contrast, isn't there?

THE children who have come to Mont-Lawn in years past have needed the country—desperately. But the girls who are having their vacations with us (vacations that they otherwise couldn't afford) need it just as desperately. For these girls have heard the call of adventure and romance. They are a part of the city and they have felt its lure. They have known temptations—the desire for clothes and fun and the youth that they have never really known. Oh, yes, they have known temptations!

The two weeks at Mont-Lawn will give these girls new impulses for good—new ideals, new health. Up among the mountains, with fresh air and green trees and blue sky, they will see things in a newer, purer light. And they will go back to the work, the discouragements, the eternal grind—with the strength to fight—and win!

Next year, please God, there will be no epidemic in the slums. Next year the little ones will come back to us, and Mont-Lawn will again—in all truth—be the Children's Paradise. But this year, even though we had to give up well-laid plans, even though we had to compromise with fate, I think that Mont-Lawn has done a worth-while work.

Don't you?

At Mont-Lawn

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

THE Girl from the City paused and stood
On a hilltop, looking down
O'er wood and road, toward the stream that flowed
On the edge of a sleepy town.
And I said to her, "Do you like it here,
Away from the city life?
Do you like the calm, and the quiet charm—
The freedom from noise and strife?"

THE Girl from the City raised her eyes
To the sky that glowed above;
And her voice came soft as she gazed aloft,
And she said: "I have felt the love—
The boundless love that they tell about,
That fills life's cup to the brim;
I never set store in God before,
But now I am close to him!"

How many, many times every one of us in our own small circles of activity acts on mental lynch law—condemns our brothers on merest supposition, working injustices that embitter the common life!

And how little a pretext we need for condemning a man when first of all we are prejudiced and sensitive! They knew he had broadened out beyond their codes of faith. Consequently they were ready to seize the first opportunity to denounce him. So, often, narrow-minded religionists have had just this suspicious spirit. The real pioneers and leaders of the church—how often have they been suspected and spoken against! Think of the scorn and enmity encountered by John Wesley in his own church as he undertook his mighty revival work. I wonder how many of us are free from a disposition to believe the worst of people we dislike or who have views differing from our own in politics or economics or faith. How singular it is that discussions of religious questions tend to become bitter and unfair and personal! This has been so true that the expression "odium theologicum" was coined to express the contemptuous hatred felt by controversialists. But, thank God, American Christians have learned to know better the spirit of the Lord Jesus.

How quickly accusation grows! They suspected the possibility of one Greek having entered the inner court. Notice the cry,—"Men of Israel, help! He brought Greeks into the temple." Greeks—plural now. As though he had habitually and frequently violated this law. Not long ago I interviewed separately two fellow churchmen who had disagreed in business. Each had nourished a grudge, had listened to many

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"Thou shalt be a witness for him unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard."—Acts 22 : 15.

The Greek word for witness is martyr, but so many of the witnesses to Christ were put to violent deaths that martyr became synonymous with death by fire, wild beast, or torture. We are all called upon to be witnesses, and if witness-bearing involves pain and suffering, the cross of shame and the grave of apparent oblivion, we must not flinch. The witness is not expected to enter upon profound arguments or discussions. No eloquence is required; no profound learning. One of the best of witnesses is an artless child who states simply what he saw or heard. This is what Christ asks from us: "Ye shall be witnesses unto me." Our model must be the mirror, not convex nor concave, but simple and plain, reflecting Jesus and letting men see and hear him in our lives and conversation. When the sun goes down in the west, we do not fear that he has ceased to exert his attractive power on the universe, because his beams are still shining on the moon. There is a celebrated picture fixed so high on the walls of St. Peter's as to be out of reach of the ordinary eye, but it is perfectly reflected in a mirror placed at a convenient distance from the floor. Your knowledge of Christ is given, not primarily for your delectation, but that you may pass it on. If you refuse to pass them on and tell them out, these manifestations of the living Christ will become fewer and cease. Believe that you are blessed like Abraham, that in you all others shall be blessed also.

false rumors about the other, and now regards his former friend and associate as a desperate villain. "He cheats and overreaches every day!" exclaimed one. Thus we exaggerate the supposed faults of others. How hard it is to state fairly and moderately our complaints against those who have offended us!

As a matter of fact, Paul was going out of his way to conciliate just such people, and spending a whole week of his precious time while home from missionary labors just to show his respect for the Jewish customs. Where he could consistently do so, he was anxious to please his countrymen. So he readily consented to the plan proposed by the Jerusalem Christians of proving his loyalty to Hebrew traditions. At their suggestion he agreed to join in a Nazarite vow with four other Jews, paying their expenses as well as his own during the seven days' consecration. This was a popular way of showing zeal for the law. It brought Paul into the temple day after day, before the altar of sacrifice and in the processions. Thus all could see his loyalty to the customs of his fathers.

This was a tactful thing for Paul to do. It is always legitimate deliberately to counteract misunderstanding and suspicion. Every Christian finds times when he must go out of his way to show himself in a favorable light to those who have conceived an unreasonable prejudice. Jesus thus paid the tribute money and observed the feasts to avoid offense. Only a short time ago a young school teacher heard that she was misunderstood and disliked by a certain family. Deliberately she cultivated the society of its members, and finally spent a social evening in that home. Cordial appreciation of a fellow Christian took the place of cold disdain, and ultimately led them all into her church. How much better is such a conciliatory disposition than the worldy rule of tit for tat, dislike for dislike, holding oneself haughtily aloof from people who after all are our brothers and sisters, and fellow travelers on life's highway.

Our lesson opened with the pleasant story of Paul s welcome from the brethren at Jerusalem. On the second day a public meeting was held, presided over by James, the brother of the Lord Jesus. Here Paul publicly recounted the story of his missionary journeys and the splendid spiritual response of the Gentile churches. As a proof of their Christian spirit he presented their generous offerings for the poor at Jerusalem. What a wonderful experience to have heard him then! We thrill as we read Luke's account today, or Paul's own words in Corinthians in last week's lesson, of perils, of ventures and of rewards. But to have heard the apostle himself must have been an inspiration to them all. It was a day of rejoicing in the triumphs of the Gospel, and the church thanked God and took courage.

Then, too, it was a further step in confirming the broad basis of Christianity established by God through Paul's ministry. The Holy Spirit had sealed the mission to the Gentiles—that was obvious to all. The new religion could never turn back to narrow and nationalistic bounds. So the returned missionary today should be the most welcomed visitor at the local church, thrilling those on guard at home with the recital of modern acts of the apostles, telling of new extensions of Christ's influence and new triumphs of redeeming grace. How long is it since you heard a splendid missionary at your church? The visit of such a genuine man of God might mark an epoch in many a Christian fellowship that had sunk into commonplace ruts. That is an excellent idea of certain missionary leaders to have a foreign representative assigned to each local church—"our missionary"—with whom a constant relation in prayers and gifts and letters may be maintained.

And today, as in the time of Paul, the great missionary leaders are bringing back to us from their fields broader visions of human brotherhood and of Christian opportunity. They are doing much to counteract the epidemic of race hatred and belligerent nationalism in the world today, besides stirring up the home church from its religious apathy. The most powerful influence against sectarianism today i our the necessity of cooperatic in missionary task, and the br d, spirit of the men whose ien and service have overleaped t de inational barriers.

But we must not leave P l i hands of the mob. At the orn the temple enclosure the Ro n s was watching the excitable ws the parapet of the Castle o Ant A shout from him, and dow rus Roman soldiers from the wer rescue the prisoner, draggi hi safety on the castle stairs. lml missionary addresses the R an tain. "May I speak with th ?" now the soldier, too, co sses supposition—he had though Pa Egyptian bandit who was a ngl of the dagger-men! That ows far we can be misunderst d. many a consecrated missi ary been thought a crafty forei son by ignorant and mistaken the

What is Paul now saying the tain: "I beseech thee, let n spe the people." He wanted p Christ to the men who sou t to him! He yearned over t n. heart's desire and my sup a ic God is for them, that th ma saved" (Rom. 10:1). The Greatness of God

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Ps. 145 : 1-21.

Three thoughts about the greatness of God. First that it is infinite, measureless, greater than all other gigantic things or essences or phenomena.

Second, this indescribable, unthinkable greatness of God takes chiefly and first and last the form of love. He is a great God. But the greatest thing about him is his love, his tenderness, his gentleness, his desire for affection, his desire to make every other being eternally glad.

Third, all this greatness of God and this greatness of his love will, if I am willing, be concentrated upon me. See II Chron. 16 : 9. There is nobody in the world that the Lord loves better than he loves you; there is no one toward whom he would rather show his infinite and infinitely friendly power.

Whatever our need, God's grace and power are sufficient. Look up especially II Cor. 12 : 9 and Phil. 4 : 19. He will cleanse our hearts and keep us from sin (see Ezek. 36 : 25-27). Note especially the words: "I will cause you to walk in my statutes." God's greatness takes the form of love, but greatness and love alike are linked inseparably with his holiness and his desire that we too shall be holy. He will give us power for our work. Paul declared confidently: "I can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth me" (Phil. 4 : 13). See also II Cor. 3 : 5. It is especially in our work for others that we may claim God's power. He likes best to give us grace and blessing and help that we may pass it on to others.

We said God's greatness is infinite, yet it appears from the study of his Word and from what we know of his dealing with souls that there is one thing he cannot do. He cannot bless a man against his will. We must welcome his blessing and power to our lives. Jesus complained to the people who turned from him: "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." (John 5 : 40.)

Rally Day

Epworth League. Isa. 2 : 2-5; Zech. 8 : 20, 21; Ps. 20 : 5.

The references for our Rally Day Bible study have been most happily chosen.

Here is the picture of God's great house, set where all can behold it, and all nations flowing to it; the picture of all people being taught by God himself; living at peace, with swords turned to plows and spears to pruning-hooks. Now the plea: "O house of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord." (Isa. 2 : 2-5.)

Here is the picture of many people seeking the place and the manner of prayer. And seeking to find it in haste. Particularly the people of the cities. Is not this a prophecy, a promise and a plea for the America of the twentieth century? This passage, too, ends with the personal note. Are you joining in that search for God in prayer? Are you saying: "I will go also!" (Zech. 8 : 20-21.) Are we getting others to seek him too?

Next the glowing picture of a people filled with God's gladness, glad because God has saved them. Then these happy, delivered people setting up their banners for further conquest in God's name (Ps. 20 : 5). Joy, Salvation, Conquest—if these are our watchwords during the coming year, nineteen seventeen will see even a gladder rally day than this.

Notice especially the topic for this week's Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Study. It is particularly appropriate for our rally day.

These fully Pneumatic Tires are NOT "Muscle-Bound"

WHY have air-filled Tires superseded all others, on Pleasure Cars?
Solid Rubber Tires would run several times as far, on the average Pleasure Car!

Steel Tires would run 15,000 to 20,000 miles, on the average Pleasure Car.

Why, then, have "Pneumatic" Tires, the best of which won't average nearly as much Mileage, so universally displaced Solid Rubber and Steel Tires on all Pleasure Cars?

Because,—the Pleasure Car must often run at "more than 15 miles" per hour.

And, when it does, the response of even Rubber Tires, if solid, is altogether too slow to take up the enormous Vibration, the jarring and shattering influences of the road, on Car Mechanism and Car Occupants.

TRUCKS and Tractors can afford to use Solid Tires.
Because, they are designed to run at relatively slow speeds, under heavy loads.

But, the Comfort, Speed, and Luxurious Ease, of riding in a true PLEASURE Car is what you chiefly BUY that Car for.

Therefore, the nearer you get to the Solid Rubber, or Steel, characteristic, in a so-called "Pneumatic" Tire, the farther away you get from what you bought the Pleasure Car for.

Let that thought sink in deeply,—then consider this:—

The thicker, and heavier, your Pneumatic Tire is, the stiffer it is.

The more layers of Canvas (beyond the number actually needed to carry the load), the thicker and stiffer, and LESS PNEUMATIC the Tire is,—the slower in absorbing Vibration.

The thicker the Casing, the harder it is to bend, in running.

And, the harder it is to bend, the more Motor-power and Gasolene is being wasted in driving the Car against excessive Traction-Wave,—the sooner the Motor wears out.

So, there you have the vicious circle into which a mistaken hope for more Mileage, through more Tire thickness, leads the Inexperienced.

DIAMOND Tires are true PNEUMATIC Tires!
—Made flexible, springy, and nimble, in order to promptly absorb Vibration and eliminate jar to Car Mechanism and Car Occupants.

They thus lengthen the life of the Car, and make Motoring the PLEASURE it is primarily intended to be.

Built with as few layers, of the best Fabric, as will carry the load FURTHEST.

Then Treaded with a fine-grained, non-ballasted, and very elastic (black) "Velvet" Rubber, the ready stretch in which acts as a sort of lubricant between Road and Fabric, preventing excessive grinding and frictional heat.

This conservation of the Original Purpose, in Pneumatic Tires, gives you not only the longest distance for every Dollar you invest in DIAMOND Tires, but——Longer life to your CAR through less Wear and Tear on its Mechanism, —That smooth road-work,—that lack of vibration,—that luxurious feeling of "riding-on-air," which is the Heart and Soul and Essence of intelligent Motoring.

Just test out a set of these "fair-listed," reasonably priced, DIAMOND Tires, and see!

It's Dependability That Counts

The most wonderful Spark Plug Record ever made under the supervision of the American Automobile Association has just been chalked up to the credit of Champions.

A stock seven-passenger eight-cylinder King car traveled 10,850 miles at an average speed of 33 miles per hour.

The long grind continued for 14 days and nights without stopping the motor an instant.

At no time was it necessary to change a single one of the eight Champions that were supplying the vital sparks—regularly and efficiently.

As the King Motor Company states in a telegram at the end of the run—

"It is the most wonderful official Spark Plug record of a stock car under triple A supervision, and speaks volumes for your product."

"JUST DAVID"

By Eleanor H. Porter

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.

"LITTLE SIR GALAHAD"

We do not know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story that it appeals to the reader probably with greater force than if the action were on a more dignified level.

It is as good a story as we have encountered in many a day, and that's saying a good deal.

We will send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, to any present subscriber, as a reward for sending us one new eight months' subscription with $1.00.

Merry Moments

WHEN the Merry Moments column was started we announced that we could only return contributions when postage was enclosed. Some contributors, evidently forgetting this, have written inquiring as to the non-return of their contributions.

SHE CIRCUMNAVIGATED THE IDEA. It was the first day of her first term of school, and the new teacher called up the class and asked a large girl to tell of Columbus's voyage.

"Well," said the girl, "Columbus started out and sailed around a dot."

"What?" said the astonished teacher.

"He sailed around a dot," repeated the girl. Pressed for her authority, she pointed triumphantly to the page in the book and the teacher read, "About this period Columbus sailed."

A GOOD GUESS. The students in a Connecticut theological seminary frequently supplied the pulpits in surrounding towns. One of these rural charges was noted for boarding the pastoral supplies at a house where beans were the favorite article of diet. Every week beans were served Saturday night and Sunday morning, Sunday night and Monday morning.

One day the supply for the week overheard the father teaching the son his Sunday school lesson. He was trying to bring out the idea of the constant presence of conscience. "Now, when there is no person with us, when we seem to be alone, what do we have with us all the time?"

"Beans!" shouted the boy.

THE DOLL DIDN'T GROW. "I do wish," observed Mildred, "that Santa Claus had brought me a new doll for Christmas."

"But your old doll," her mother answered, "is as good as ever."

"So am I as good as ever," the little girl retorted, "but the doctor brought you a new baby."—Tit-Bits.

A WISE CONSTITUENT. A congressman received almost daily letters from a constituent asking for garden seed, with emphasis on peas. The demand for peas got so heavy that the congressman was moved to write this letter:

"I am sending you a half dozen more packages of peas as requested. Say, what are you trying to do down there, plant the whole state in peas?"

The reply came a few days later. It read:

"No, I'm not planting them, but they make bully soup. Send along some more."—Kansas City Star.

Among the Workers

A COMMITTEE representing 800 negroes of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Washington and some southern cities who have organized the People's Civil League, is negotiating with the Santa Fe Railroad for the purchase of 20,000 acres in Western Kansas, on which to establish a farming colony, which is to be exclusively negro. Only negroes now farming or those in cities who wish to farm will be admitted to the colony. The deeds to the land will prevent, in perpetuity, its resale to a white man and the charter of the colony will provide that only negroes shall hold office. Negro teachers will direct the aim of the young idea in the colony. Churches will be given ten acres apiece as sites, but only one church of any denomination is to be admitted. Kansas now has a similar colony established twenty years ago—Nicodemus, in Graham County. It is a prosperous, law-abiding community.

BLOOMFIELD, N. J., Theological Seminary has found openings in pastoral work among foreigners in America for a number of its latest graduates. One goes to be the minister of an Italian church at Stapleton, S. I.; another to a Hungarian church at Wharton, N. J.; a third is pastor of a German Reformed church in New York; the fourth goes to a Hungarian mission at Elizabeth, N. J.; a fifth to a Polish mission in Wilmington, N. C.; and a sixth to a Sunday school for Russian children in Brooklyn.

UNDER separate cover I am mailing you a copy of our Church and Sunday Paper, published at Chieng Mai, North Siam, in our native (Lao) print. The story of "Joseph and Asenath," published in the Christian Herald in March, 1904, was translated into Lao and published in instalments in our paper, and has now just come from the press in book form, of which I also send you a copy. I cannot tell you how eagerly our Christians read this story and how much good it is doing. I hope to put a copy into every temple in this province, and to this end am using the check you so kindly sent me. I wish I could buy Christian literature to give to our evangelists to distribute to those who would derive great good from such reading. "My Word shall not return to me void!" Thank you for the Christian Herald. It is read by all our friends, and many of the boys and girls in our schools get help from its pages. God bless you all, is the sincere prayer of your old friend in service,

The Police of the Yukon

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

THE Kaiser keeps good order in Germany. He has the largest single army on earth, and five or six million soldiers respond to his call. His principality is in the neighborhood of 200,000 square miles. There is a man here at Dawson who is military ruler of a country almost as large. It is a part of the Dominion of Canada, and is known as the Territory of the Yukon. It begins at the south, within thirty miles of the Pacific Ocean, and extends to Herschel Island, near where the Mackenzie River flows into the Arctic. It is about a thousand miles long and several hundred miles wide, and it has a nomadic and settled population of Indians, Eskimos and white men. The army that keeps this great tract in order consists of less than fifty men, and the record of unpunished crime is proportionately less than that of Germany. It is known as the Yukon Division of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and its commander is Sergeant Major R. S. Knight, who only recently has come here from Regina to succeed Major J. Moodie, retired. Major Moodie has had control of the territory for a number of years. I have met him during my stay, and have had a long chat with him as to how Canada keeps such good order in this frontier land of the North.

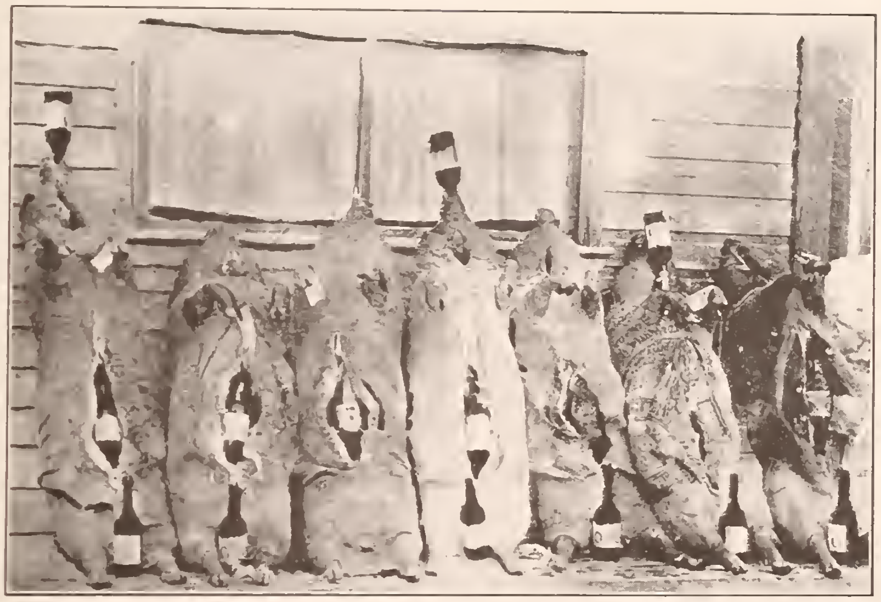
But first let me give you a general idea of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. My information comes from Colonel Frederick White, the commissioner of the territorial districts of Canada and the commander-in-chief of the force. Colonel White's headquarters are at Ottawa, and it was in his office there some time ago that I met him and talked about this remarkable organization. At that time it consisted of less than 1,000 men. Since the war broke out in Europe the number has been increased to fifteen hundred, but the most of the increase has gone to the southern parts of the Dominion, and the number in the Yukon remains just about the same.

Each policeman has a route, along which he rides from farm to farm and town to town, asking whether anything wrong has taken place since his last visit. He has to send in a report from every settler, and if misdemeanors are committed he has to arrest and punish the offenders. Where murders or other high crimes occur he takes the criminal to court, and he often acts as detective, keeping on the trail day and night until evidence is secured that brings the robber to prison or the murderer to the gallows.

The mounted police have made many of the trails of the Far North. They cut the first road through the wilds to the Yukon, at the time of the gold discovery, and they have opened up the Rocky Mountains to prospectors. In their explorations they sometimes erect houses along the trails and leave supplies of provisions for other travelers who may come after.

Major Moodie tells me that the Yukon force is scattered all over this territory. Said he:

"Each constable has one or two men with him, and sometimes an Indian or so as well. Together they patrol the whole country. They make long trips visiting the mines, and reporting what is going on among the prospectors. They administer justice as to small matters in the out-of-the-way districts, and they keep order among the Indians and the Eskimos. They also see that the poor and the insane are cared for and brought to the asylums. In fact, they do almost everything except grant divorces. We have cases where they have performed the ceremony of marriage, but their chief business is the keeping of order and the punishment of crime."



This picture shows how whisky is sometimes smuggled into the Yukon, and also, if you study it, the general characteristics of the smugglers

"But how can you keep track of the people in such a large territory, Major Moodie? Your whole land is a wilderness, and for more than half of the year it is all snow and ice."

"We manage to know pretty well where every one is all the time," was the reply. "We have regulations by which every hotel and roadhouse is required to keep a daily record of all who stop there. The arrivals and departures are reported to the police, and this is so in the towns as well as in the wilds. I may say that we know about where every man in the territory sleeps every night.

"We get reports of all the passengers who go up and down the river, and from every telegraph station they pass on the way. When a steamer leaves White Horse for Dawson, the purser hands in the names of his passengers and they are telegraphed here. If any one gets off on the way his name is telegraphed, and we check up the list when the boats come in. If a man starts out in a canoe to go up or down the river it is reported, and if three men start out and one is missing, we can see this from the difference in the report on that canoe as it passes the next telegraph station. The police also patrol the country from their various stations. They send in reports of just who come in and who go out of their respective districts, and also what they are doing while they are there."

"Give me some idea of the amount of crime committed in your territory."

"Our record is fairly good. I have here the jail report for the past year, which includes the penitentiary as well. The total number confined during that time was eighty-two, and of these seventy-four were males and eight were females. Three of the males were insane. Our daily average of persons in jail last year was less than nine, and the most we had on any one day was twelve. This is for a country as large as France, and for a population largely made up of frontiersmen and miners.

"Indeed, we have so few bad characters under arrest that it is difficult to keep our barracks in order and the lawn properly mowed. We make the prisoners work. The women do hard labor in the laundry."

"Have you many murders in the Klondike?"

"The records show that we have had altogether only fourteen since gold was discovered, and that the murderers were all hanged. No, I am mistaken, they were all hanged but one. He was shot. That covers a period back to 1895.

"Some of the murder stories of this part of the world are interesting," continued the major. "Take, for instance, one that is said to have occurred in Alaska. The murdered man was a miner and he was killed by an Indian at the close of the season when the miners were just about to leave until next year. They had not time to follow the Indian and arrest him, but they went to the chief and told him that he must catch the murderer and have him ready for them when they returned in the spring, as they intended to hang him. When spring came they went to the chief and demanded the man. He replied:

"'Me got him all right. You come see.' He thereupon took them to the back of the camp and showed them a dead Indian frozen in a large block of ice. As they looked the chief continued: 'We got him last fall. We know you kill him in spring, so we shoot him in fall. What use feed him all winter?'

"Our greatest trouble is from the smuggling of liquor. The kind sold has been almost pure alcohol. We try to prevent its getting to the Indians and we do all we can to keep it out. Nevertheless, it comes in in all sorts of ways. We have had cases of the whisky in bottles being put inside dressed hogs, which were then sewed up and shipped in."

I asked Major Moodie how it was that the mounted police are so feared by bad characters that this whole territory can be controlled by a handful. He replied:

"One reason is that the men know that the police are sure to get them sooner or later. When an officer is sent after them they realize that they could easily kill him, but they know also that a second force will be sent, and this force will be increased until they are finally overpowered.

"Our officers do not carry clubs; all that is necessary seems to be to put your hand on a man and tell him to come. Twenty of our men have stopped a mob consisting of hundreds. One thing that helps us is the fact that the government supports us, and it is known it will fight to the end. In the O'Brien murder it cost the government $200,000 to convict, but it was done and the man was hanged. Sir Wilfrid Laurier used to say that he would spend all the money in the treasury rather than that a murderer should go unpunished. That policy has done much to enable us to keep order in the wilderness."

Once Too Often

Two pairs of Tire Chains were in the tool box, but he did not stop to put them on.

An evil impulse tempted him to continue over the wet pavements with bare tires. He ventured on for a few blocks, and then, in a flash, came the frightful skid leaving death in its wake.

How strange it is that some motorists are sometimes tempted to take a chance. They carry Tire Chains in their tool boxes, but they do not put them on at the first indication of slippery going. They wait too long once too often and disastrous skidding accidents result.

"Put on Tire Chains at the First Indication of Wet and Slippery Streets" is a Safety First Commandment of vital importance. It should always be obeyed by all motorists for the protection of all road users.

DURING the next few weeks you will be putting up clean draperies and curtains for the fall and winter. Why not still further increase the charm of your home by brightening up your carpets?

You can do this easily and successfully by using Ivory Soap. Its copious lather thoroughly removes the dust and dirt but, unlike ordinary soap, it is so pure and mild that it does not fade the colors or spoil the nap.

Proceed as directed below and you will be able with very little effort and at trifling cost to make your floor coverings as attractive as when new:

To Clean Carpets and Rugs

Sweep thoroughly. Then beginning at the corner farthest from the door, scatter Ivory Soap Paste (see directions inside wrapper) over not more than a square yard at a time. Scrub vigorously with a stiff scrubbing brush. Scrape off the paste with a metal-edged ruler or a piece of zinc. Wipe thoroughly with a cloth wrung out of clean, lukewarm water. Work with—not against—the nap. Use water sparingly.

Making New Americans

"THE flag? Oh, I saw it first in Genoa," said an Italian immigrant to his American guest. "I was fourteen years old, and into the harbor came a white three-master, loaded wi sugar, and flying the stars and stripes. I as d what it was, and when they told me, the symbol of merica, I made up my mind to come over.

But my little boy, this four-year-old, is a regular A rican. We don't know where he gets it, for the m her never lets him go out on the streets. But he a regular American. Sometimes I think it co es in at the window!"

d plainly it must, so great is the miracle-working po er of our air. Immigrant children absorb Amer-ica sm, or are absorbed by it, very quickly, thanks to e great work done by the public school and the pu ic library. And what loyal little patriots they ar es, if what is called the danger and the problem of mmigration were limited to the children, solving th one and eliminating the other would be easy. B there are the adults to be considered—nearly fif n millions of them in all; nearly four million w are not citizens, though of voting age; nearly a llion and a half who are illiterate.

r our own wellbeing, as much as for theirs, the men must be Americanized. Is it ossible that there is here material fo good citizenship? Yes, over and over, ye any immigrants come to our country, a ated with the same purpose that b ght our Puritan ancestors to New E land and that later peopled the West-er states. They have this pioneer quality, to tart with—one of the best ingredients fo making patriots worthy of the name.

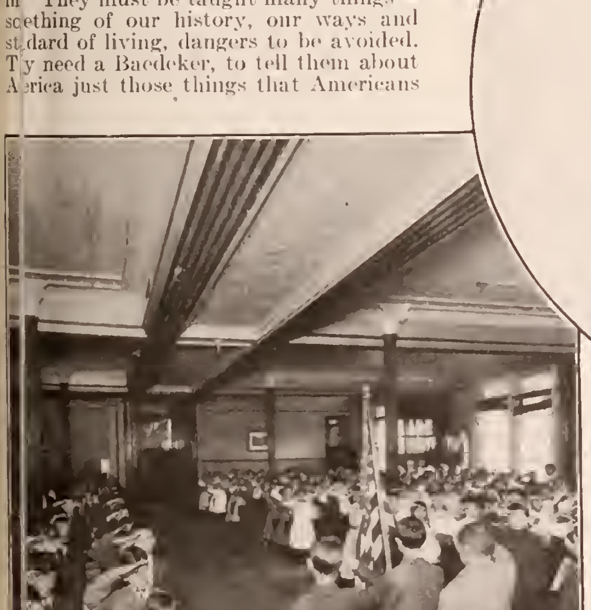
ut they need a background of American li They must be taught many things—so ething of our history, our ways and st dard of living, dangers to be avoided. T y need a Baedeker, to tell them about A erica just those things that Americans n d to know in European countries, and they need s much more! Facts and information must be given w h brevity, and with respect for the reader; in a ition, the telling must be extremely simple, yet a ealing to intelligent adults.

Baedeker for the immigrant! A "Guide"! Just w at is needed to begin the process of Americaniza-t n!



Citizens-to-be salute the flag

All the talk of "hyphens" that has been in the air and in the press the last year has brought home to many thinking people the fact that our foreign-born must be given this information, and also some reason for the loyalty we ask of them. If they come in contact with the worst of our city life instead of the best, why should they love America? What adequate reason do we give them?

AMERICANIZE the immigrant, you now hear, repeatedly and increasingly. But the suggestion is not new, for nearly ten years ago a New Yorker, John Foster Carr, sensed this need and realized the possibilities of service it offered. He had, moreover, that rare combination—the gift of seeing the vision, plus the knowledge to put it into concrete help for the immigrant.

Though he is a "regular American," like the four-year-old, and an American of eight generations, chance gave him his college training in Oxford, and during the summer vacations he left England and took long walking trips on the continent. Avoiding the towns, he learned to know the peasant very intimately. He picked up their Italian. He slept in their little inns. He shared their simple meals.

John Foster Carr, author of the Immigrants' Baedeker

Back in America again, he kept his interest in the Italians, and made friends with many immigrants. Exactly as he had been helped by their countrymen in Europe, he could help here, because he knew American conditions so thoroughly. He saw the need, and slowly there came to him the idea of a book, written especially for the Italian immigrant, to tell him about America.

The Italian government, struck by some of his magazine articles on immigration, asked him for such a book, "to save our men trouble." A year and a half was spent in getting the material together, though it made only eighty-four pages when the volume was finished. Suggestions for it came from many sources, and in odd ways.

The failure of a private bank, sweeping away the savings of Italian workmen, led to great discussions in the little restaurant where Mr. Carr frequently dines with his friends of the Bleecker Street district. There was much protesting against the banking laws; but not a man knew of the security of savings banks, not a man had ever heard of sending funds back to Genoa and Sicily by a money-order they could buy at the post office! "That must go into the Guide," says Mr. Carr to himself.

A visiting nurse in the Italian colony asked his advice about mothers who gave their babies wine and beer. "There, we must have a health section in the little green book!"

Among the more ignorant Italians, it is not uncommon to find that they class Americans as English. Do you speak English? they hear constantly. Well, Italians speak Italian, they reason, so Englishmen must talk English. The Guide shall teach them that we are not English, but Americans, and at the same time give them something of the message of America, was a thought ever in the author's mind.

Learning the story of the flag

EACH chapter was written to meet some need he had observed—how to get work, learn English, opportunities for farming, how to travel, laws likely to be broken innocently, schools for adults and for children, how to become a citizen and why—pitfalls to be avoided, opportunities to be used, how to adapt the old life to the new.

Before the book was printed, each chapter was given two tests. For criticism and suggestions, they were sent to state and city and Federal officials—a lawyer, a doctor, the head of the naturalization bureau, housing experts.

Then, section by section, Mr. Carr read it aloud to the Italians themselves, stopping frequently to ask, "Is that clear? Have I told what you want to know?" and to himself he would put the question, "Am I reaching them? Do I say it right? Could any phrase offend them?'

"Ah, the book, the most wonderful book!" said Giovanni, to whom the manuscript was sent. "We read all the pages last night. Oh, if only I had it when I first came to America!"

When the Guide was finally printed, it won immediate praise from every side. The Italian government honored Mr. Carr with two medals and a decoration. The American Library Association broke its rule against books in foreign languages, to include it in their lists. The Board of Missions of the Protestant churches recommended its use, in an appeal for the immigrant. Catholic papers praised it, the Y. M. C. A. endorsed it, the W. C. T. U. distributed large numbers.

But the truest appreciation of its worth came from the immigrants. "It contains pages of gold, that Italians should commit to memory," one Italian newspaper said; and this has been done in several instances, not pages only, but the entire book learned by heart.

Angelo said, "When the Italian comes to your country, he is like a sheep alone; he doesn't know anything, or what to do, and your book guides him." And Gusto compared himself, on his arrival, to a piece of wood that everybody kicks about, and that belongs nowhere.

"I learned more out of the Guide," wrote a brick-layer, "what I ought to know about America, than I did in the whole two years I am here."

BUT Mr. Carr's acquaintance was not limited to the Italians. Other immigrants heard of the "little green book," and asked their good friend to write a Guide specially for them. So a Yiddish book was prepared, with the cooperation of these immigrants, and later a Polish one; and versions in twenty-six other languages have been requested, over and over.

But getting another Guide ready is slow work, for the different books are not mere translations. The details must suit the needs of each nationality, appealing to their special interests and race pride. In the chapter on American history, for example, the Italian book tells that America was discovered by one Italian, and named for another; while the Yiddish version says that four Jews came over with Columbus, and the Polish mentions Pulaski and Kosciusko among the Revolutionary leaders.

Jewish immigrants are given the addresses of hospitals where kosher food is served. Poles are warned against intoxicants, Italians about carrying long knives. When a difficulty arises, the Italian is referred to his consul; the Pole, "the man without a country," is told only to seek an honest lawyer.

Other books were asked for, by immigrants, and by Americans interested in helping them. So a simple, practical, first book in English was issued, and a volume of biography called "Makers of America," giving the message of our country in the stirring stories of Franklin, Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln.

Constant requests came from librarians for competent help in choosing foreign books; and Mr. Carr published "Italian Library Helps," listing nearly five hundred volumes, telling in English the scope of each book, its merits, something of the author or his fame, with special emphasis on books dealing with American life and history, and the spirit of our country. He plans to follow this with library helps in other languages—Yiddish first, as those books are most in demand. And there are other plans afoot: a book on citizenship, one on United States history, others on hygiene and agriculture, and a special book for women.

THE "little green books," as the various Guides are called, the little blue book of biography, the little brown library book, have started a nation-wide movement that has its center in the little office on Fifth Avenue. Mr. Carr keeps in closest personal touch with his helpers, and highly interesting are their letters of suggestion and question, of approbation and criticism. For such work can be made ore helpful only as the users of the books indicate.

But such personal work does not limit the nu ber helped; the persons reached by a single Guide c not be estimated. Here is a librarian in a factory t wn, sending a second order, because the first book are completely worn out. Think how many m-migrants must have pored over each one, and p ed the knowledge on to friends! Their influence infinite, like the ripples from a stone thrown into a iet lake.

"I wish," said a Jew at a meeting in a schooll ise on the East Side of New York, "that all the p ple who dislike us immigrants could come here an see this thrilling sight, the reverence that our chi en have for the flag—that it stands for peace, prosp ty, equality, enlightenment, and good citizenship. M be then they would believe that men and women ho are foreign-born are also capable of appreciating ese things."

How better can we serve than in helping to A ericanize our foreign-born? The task is presen in every town and village, in every section of the nd. The materials are here at hand. Teaching lo ty gets you thoroughly imbued with its spirit.

Our foreign-born must become "regular Americ s."

The Church Question in Mexico

By
HENRY ALLEN TUPPER

THE church question is an overshadowing one in Mexico. In the first quarter of the sixteenth century, when Cortez conquered Montezuma and abolished his empire, he forced the Roman Catholic Church upon the Indians of Mexico; and uninterruptedly for three centuries it bore its fruit among a docile, ignorant and superstitious people. It is well to keep in mind the character, possessions and attainments of the natives whom the Spanish conqueror found in Mexico on his arrival. They had a written language, a crude religion, an intelligent form of government, and a judicial system that was excellent in many respects. At the palace in Mexico City, a supreme court for the hearing of law appeals was maintained; inferior tribunals were established in different parts of the empire; judges held office for life; decisions in criminal cases were final; and the court records were kept in correct and systematic form. Every ingenious and fanatical method was used by Cortez, backed by his political and ecclesiastical system, to destroy, root and branch, the civilization of Montezuma's kingdom; and into the lives of the childlike, receptive Mexicans was sown the seed, the fruit from which ripened in after years.

UNDER these influences from Spain, it is a question whether the people subdued by Cortez have made any advance in their material, mental and moral estates. The opening of the nineteenth century, three hundred years after Cortez landed at Vera Cruz, found the Catholic Church in Mexico not only religiously but politically and financially all-powerful; but soon thereafter its strength commenced to wane, although it held tenaciously to its former traditions and practices.

The three years' religious war, from 1856 to 1859, marked the beginning of reforms in church and state. The practical results of this conflict were the separation of church and state, the incapacity of the church to own landed property and the abolition of all religious orders. These principles were embodied in what are known as "The Laws of the Reform;" and in 1874 they were incorporated in the constitution of the republic of Mexico. The powerful and fruitful tree that had been rooted in the vitals of the nation for so many years could not be expected to die without a mighty struggle; and today, although more than four decades of years have passed since the laws of the Reform were promulgated, the tree is not entirely leafless and fruitless.

IT is proposed by the present Constitutional movement to enforce strictly the provisions of the Constitution of 1874; and this inflexible decision is the occasion of bitter and determined opposition. The following words of Mr. Luis Cabrera, one of the ablest members of the Constitutionalist party, are suggestive and significant: "The aim of the Constitutionalist government with regard to the Mexican Catholic Church is to enforce the strict observance of the laws known as Laws of the Reform, which up to this time have been disregarded. The Constitutionalist government demands the fulfilment of these laws, because they form an integral part of the Mexican constitution. These laws must be maintained because the causes which demanded their enactment are still prevailing in the country."

The position of the Constitutional government in regard to the Catholic Church in Mexico was clearly set forth in a conversation I had with First Chief Carranza. He is a close observer of current events and an intelligent student of history. While nominally a Catholic, he greatly deplores the abuses of the Church, and is determined to correct them. He maintains that the three principles of the "Laws of Reform" named above must be carried out to the letter. Because of the drastic methods adopted to enforce obedience to these provisions of the constitution, bitter criticisms have resulted.

THE First Chief put especial emphasis upon the necessity of the recognition and establishment of the first Reform Law, namely, separation of church and state. He and his associates insist that much of the trouble that has come to the republic has been caused by the violation of this principle; and he holds that with the cessation of the Catholic Church as a political party, there will dawn a new era, social, economical and governmental. For many years the "Catholic Party" has been a strong political orga zation; it sought to nominate and elect its candi tes for President and Vice-President and for the S te and House of Deputies of the Congress; and i insisted upon controlling other influential pol al offices, state and federal.

By His Cross

By
Richard Arnold Greene

WHEN cares on cares are piling,
And sore our spirits press,
Lord, let us own then, smiling,
Thy weights of blessedness;
Then, like good Simon, bearing
Thy Cross in Calvary's train,
Shall we be honored, sharing
Thy weariness and pain.

Shall scathing scorn assail us,
And coward envy's darts?
Shall cruel hatred nail us,
And tear our bleeding hearts?
Then let us be forgiving
Like Thee, O Victim pure;
And, in our daily living,
In patient love endure.

Shall base injustice pain us,
And irony's hard fling?
Do Thou, dear Lord, restrain us
From words that bruise and sting.
Teach us the silence royal
That on the Cross was thine,
That we to Thee all loyal,
May with Thy meekness shine.

When, on our pilgrim marching,
We pant for boons denied—
Oh, by Thy lips sore parching,
When Thou wast crucified—
Till Thou shalt come relieving
The thirst wherewith we pine,
Lift us, above all grieving,
To courage, Lord, like thine.

When griefs around us thicken,
And clutch of pain is strong;
When our worn spirits sicken,
Be Thy dear Cross our song.
How bright our day of sorrow
Beside that woe of Thine!
How glad will be our morrow
That with Thy joy shall shine!

In patient self-denial
Help us the cross to bear,
That we in Thy sharp trial
May have a brother's share.
Help us, in daily serving,
The flesh to crucify,
Who, in thy love unswerving,
Didst for us sinners die.

When death at length draws near us,
And earth recedes from sight,
Lord, by thy dying cheer us,
And glorify our night;
That we, through shadows creeping
O'er mortal scenes that flit,
May to our Father's keeping
Our trusting souls commit.

We praise thee for the gladness
That all our days o'erflows
Down from thy Cross, whose sadness
No soul of mortal knows:
Thine was the pure Heart riven,
The tortured dying breath,
That we might be forgiven,
And triumph over death.

It was pointed out to me by General Car za that the Catholic Church of Mexico, in secret d gn and in avowed purpose, is quite different fron he same church in the United States; therefore is with difficulty that the citizens of a country v re the separation of church and state is an establ ed fact can fully appreciate the peril in which M co has been placed by the church.

THE position is also taken by the Constitution sts that the ownership of landed property anc he maintenance of religious orders constitute a me ce to democratic institutions, and tend to restor on of the temporal power of the church as the ulti te end in view. Attention was called to the fact at for centuries the Catholic Church remained the ost powerful landed proprietor in the republic, an its enormous wealth, together witl its social, political and religious pc er, enabled it to have practical cont of the state and to dominate the a irs of society, finance and governme

Other countries have faced he same danger. The statute of r rtmain, by the British Parliar nt, sought to correct a similar evil; nd Italy in the last century, and F ce and Spain in the present cen y, resorted to the same remedies at were adopted in Mexico subseq nt upon the Three Years' War, and re effectually enforced during the t es of Benito Juarez. During the ist years of the presidency of Diaz he Laws of Reform were permitted be evaded and violated; and the pr nt government is addressing itself t he work of correcting these evasions nd violations.

The Constitutionalists insist at the Catholic Church in Mexico is nd always has been, opposed to the ec ation of the people. For centuries, ey declare, the country was under th nfluence of Catholicism; the seed pla ed under the papal power at Rome re its harvest in the ignorance, supe tition, poverty and corruption of he masses. During those years Pr stant countries became more and re enlightened and civilized, while I xico increased in illiteracy and degr ation. In the light of these facts he world must justify and encou ge the position taken by the new vernment.

WITHOUT doubt, a new da is dawning upon this pe le. The old order is slowly but s ly passing away; political, economic nd religious reforms will in due tim be established; and out of the mist es and confusion that must naturally and necess ly follow a national revolution, there will emerge et us hope, an era of peace, progress and prosperit to the republic of Mexico. Where Meiji Tenno Lies Buried

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D.
Founder of Christian Endeavor

WHEN, in 1910, I had the privilege of an audience with His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, his name was Mutsuhito; but when, in 1916, I visited his tomb, I found that was no longer proper to speak of him as the Emperor Mutsuhito, but as Meiji; for his posthumous name is that of his era—Meiji, the Era of Glorious Enlightenment.

And his long, long reign was, indeed, an era of glorious enlightenment; for during it Japan was opened to Western learning, and in some respects bettered her instructors. During this reign schools were established all over the empire; universities, equal to the best, were built; railroads connected all the larger centers of population; great steamships of Japanese construction brought the products of the Orient to every port of the Occident; and, above all, Christianity, with its schools and churches and high ideals of family and social life, became, though not a dominant, yet a very important, factor in the Land of the Rising Sun.

In short, Japan, within the space of that one reign, sprang forward into the forefront of the family of nations, conquered two of the greatest powers in the world in short and decisive wars, and became recognized in the world of science, literature and the arts as one of the most important and brainy of nations.

No emperor of modern times, perhaps none in any age, ever saw such momentous changes for the better in his own land—changes in which his wisdom, patience and sagacity had a large part, and he died loved and revered, without a cloud upon his reputation as an honest, patriotic ruler.

No wonder that I was glad to have a private audience with such a man in his lifetime, and to pay my respects to his memory, at his mausoleum, after his death.

In life he was erect, soldierly, courteous, and as affable as such a dignitary is allowed to be to ordinary mortals. But the Great Leveler is no respecter of persons. When God's time came, Death claimed him, but his people resolved that he should have a burial place as magnificently impressive as his life had been splendidly glorious in the history of Japan.

THE emperors of Japan are not buried in royal cathedrals or great indoor mausoleums, as are the kings of Europe; but the canopy of their tombs is the blue sky, their pillars are stately pine trees, their decorations are the cherry blossoms of spring, the glows of summer, the snows of winter, and always the ever changing clouds above.

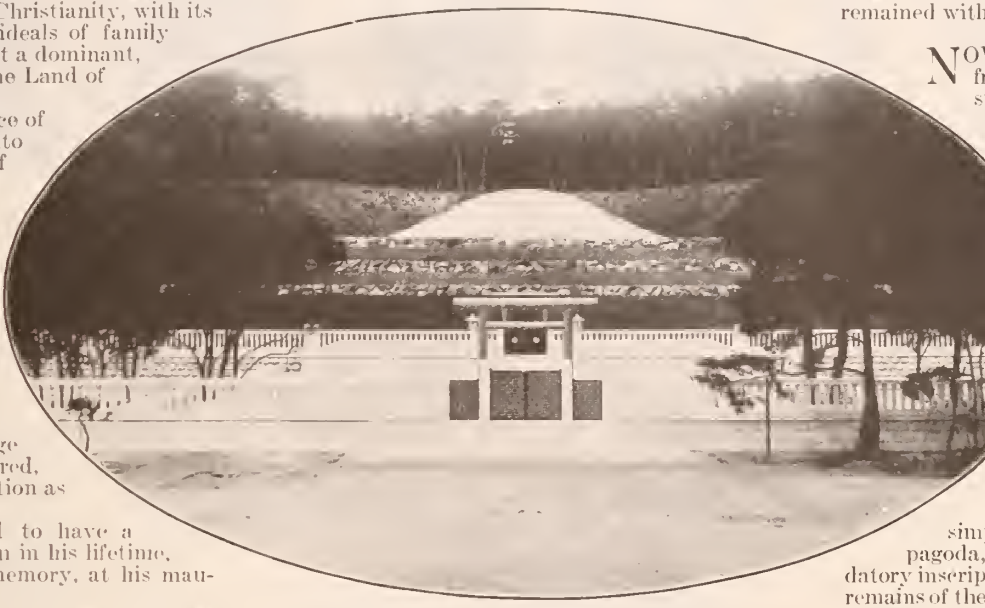
Most of the tombs are in the vicinity of Kyoto, the ancient capital and most sacred city of Japan, the city where the emperors are crowned and buried, though now they reign in Tokyo.

I was invited by Dr. Harada, the eminent president of the Doshisha, the Christian university, to visit the royal tombs with him, and, as our auto sped through the busy streets of Kyoto, and out into the suburbs, many interesting and characteristic sights met our eyes: the gaily dressed children; the men and women shuffling along on their clogs raised two inches above the mud by cross-sections of wood; the hundreds of little shops containing a few score dollars' worth of goods, always artistically arranged, however small and cheap, whether fruit, fish or dry-goods; for the Japanese are unconscious artists.

Foot passengers, jinrikishas, carts laden with rice or sake, make way for us at the honk of our auto horn, and scatter in every direction, for a motor car, though not an unusual sight, is not the every-day affair it has become in America.

At length, some seven miles out of the city, our car slows up, for a dense mass of humanity blocks our way; all are going in the same direction. Thousands and thousands of men, women and children, mostly on foot, but a few in 'rickshas, and still fewer in autos, and all with serious faces, are bent on a visit to the tomb of their late beloved monarch, the Emperor of the Era of Glorious Enlightenment.

And this is no special fête day, but every day and all days this great procession, ten thousand strong or more, wends its way to the last resting-place of Meiji. The tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon is visited by a few straggling tourists every day, and the tomb of Lincoln at Springfield by as many more; but it is safe to say that as many visit the tomb of the late emperor of Japan in a day as see the last resting-place of the greatest of our worthies in a year.



The Mausoleum at Momo Yama. The body of Mutsuhito lies under the great white mound

OVER a long broad road we travel, built as a highway to the tomb, and at last come to a great park, backed by a somber pine-clad hill that rises five or six hundred feet above the plain. At the foot of this hill, raised on two wide terraces above the level, is a vast mound of cement covered with small pebbles, and in that severely simple but mightily impressive mausoleum lies all that is mortal of Japan's greatest emperor—greatest, at least, if we measure him by the beneficent results of his reign.

Two wide spaces, each enclosed by an open fence of granite, separate us and the throng of Japanese from the tomb. We can only look at it across a respectful distance of three or four hundred yards, but no foot of ordinary mortal is allowed to approach nearer.

"Have you a frock coat on?" said President Harada.

Alas, no; opening my overcoat revealed only a black sack coat underneath; and in those habiliments the officials, courteous as they were, could only allow me to approach the outer fence. Had I been arrayed in a Prince Albert, I could have gone as far as the inner stone fence.

When I called upon the emperor during his life, though it was only eleven o'clock in the morning, I wore evening dress and white gloves, according to court custom and costume; but I had not been informed that court dress was prescribed for His Majesty dead as well as for His Majesty living. However, I could see practically all there was to see, and I was as well off as the great multitude of my Japanese brothers and sisters, who, like me, had no regal habiliments.

President Harada, knowing the customs, wore a frock coat and silk hat, and could have approached nearer to his late Majesty's remains; but he kindly remained with us and the common herd.

NOW let us approach the outer barrier. In front of it, at a little distance, is a large stone fountain with many long-handled dippers on the edge. Filling one of these at the fountain, we each washed our hands by pouring clean, cold water upon them, while our Japanese friends rinsed out their mouths as well; for you must approach the royal tomb only with clean hands and a pure heart.

Then, taking off our hats and outside garments, we stood for a few moments in respectful silence, while the whole solemn scene photographed itself on our memories—the somber pine-clad hill, the great stone torii, the low granite barriers that enclosed the terraces; and there, dominating it all, that great, simple mound of cement and pebbles. No pagoda, no vault guarded by iron doors, no laudatory inscription, no ornate marbles such as guard the remains of the nobles in the Campo Santo of Genoa and the burial places of other European cities! Nothing could be more simple, nothing could be more grand.

Hundreds, if not thousands, of large trees, at least forty or fifty feet tall, had been transplanted to the grounds around the tomb, and these were swathed in cloth from top to bottom to ensure their living. Everything had been done to add to the natural impressiveness of the situation, but nothing to rivet the attention on any work of man.

Who will say that the Emperor Meiji has not a more beautiful canopy in the blue sky, and more lovely statuary in the green trees that surround him, than any dead emperor enclosed within the walls of minster or palace?

IT was most interesting to watch the behavior of the mourning thousands. Perfect silence prevailed. With clean hands they took off their outer garments, folded them, and laid them on the ground. Then kneeling and prostrating themselves they did reverence to the memory of their emperor. Many, I presume, actually worshiped him; for Japan is as yet far from being a Christian country, and emperor-worship is part of the old-time religion.

Christians, however, need only pay respect and homage as they would at the grave of any great man. Yet I have no doubt that some find it difficult to draw the line between the respect due to a man and the reverence due to God; and perhaps some Christians bow in the house of Rimmon, and lose their consciences, as did General Naaman of old.

MEXICAN AND AMERICAN MEMBERS OF THE JOINT COMMISSION TO ARRANGE A PERMANENT PEACE

All's Well on the Border. The National Guard troops called to the border have so far, except for a couple of unimportant skirmishes, fought only hurricanes and sand storms. Secretary Baker on August 21 stated that the militia will be held on the border until all danger is past. He said that the state soldiers were winning bloodless victories daily, and that there had not been such complete security along the border in many years. The sanitary precautions have made possible a new health record for American military camps. There has been very little sickness among the troops. Those whose dependents are suffering because of their military service are being released and mustered out as fast as the cases are investigated. The Secretary said that the militia on the border were performing an important and necessary service to their country.

Bombed from Below. It is estimated that thirty persons were killed and 150 injured in Italy alone in an earthquake which, in the middle of August, shook Italy and all of the territory about the head of the Adriatic Sea. The shock was felt throughout the territory in which the armies are fighting and in some Italian cities caused less alarm than had been created by the bombing attacks of Austrian aviators.

Land Bill Vetoed. On August 22 President Wilson vetoed the bill which was intended to permit cities and towns and counties to acquire parts of the national forests for community purposes. The President found that the bill did not sufficiently safeguard the national interest in the forests.

To Restrict Immigration. On August 21 ten Democrats, voting with the Republicans in the Senate, forced the Immigration Bill upon the Senate calendar and postponed the consideration of the General Revenue Bill. This is the same Burnett Bill, containing the clause restricting immigration along educational lines, which is sponsored by the American Federation of Labor and opposed by nearly everybody else, and which has been three times vetoed, once by Mr. Wilson. On August 22 the Senate reversed itself, 32 to 23, it is said upon notice that the bill would be vetoed if passed.

Deutschland Home. The submarine merchantman Deutschland reached the mouth of the Weser on August 23, twenty-one days after leaving the Virginia Capes. All on board were reported well. The Bremen, her sister ship, is still being awaited on this side of the Atlantic.

Skeffington Murdered. The inquiry into the shooting during the rebellion in Ireland of F. Sheehy Skeffington, Fred Mackintyre and Thomas Dickson developed that these men had been shot without trial by order of Captain Bowen-Colthurst, who upon court martial for his arbitrary and unwarranted action was found guilty but insane. Skeffington, who was being followed by an excited crowd, had been arrested as a precautionary measure by a subordinate officer.

Helping the First American. It is announced by the Bureau of Indian Affairs that in the last three years approximately $4,000,000 has been invested in cattle used in stocking Indian reservations, and that these cattle have increased in value about 15 per cent. each year since their purchase. The proper administration of these herds on the fine grazing lands of the reservations is expected to make a material increase in the beef supply of the nation. It is announced also that the health campaign conducted by the Indian Bureau, one of the prime objects of which has been to correct improper modes of living, has shown suc esult that for the first time in many y rs th birth rate among the India nov exceeds the death rate.

Uncle Sam's Big Farm. A ecen compilation by the Departmen of th Interior shows that there a stil 254,945,589 acres of the tiona domain unreserved and una ropri ated. Missouri has the least ea o vacant public land, 952 ac , an Nevada the greatest area, 53 5,07 acres. There are still 2,382,5 acre in South Dakota and 381,199 res i North Dakota, but this land is pidl passing into private hands. grea deal of the acreage still re ainin resembles the perpendicular f ns o Vermont, of which it was said t t yo could farm both sides; some it arid and above any immediat wate supply, but there is still much g l lan for the man who is possess of pioneer spirit.

Working Toward a Strike ttlement. In the great struggle twee the railroad executives of the untr and the labor brotherhoods, th thir week of August will deserve o b remembered as marked by stor episodes during which the teria welfare of the nation hung in e ba ance. There were sessions in th Whi House almost daily, at which P siden Wilson conferred with the ilroa presidents and managers, alt ating with the representatives of the othe hoods, as in the preceding week Wi all the skill of which he is ma er, h urged the committees of railroa xecu tives to avert the strike by ce edin the eight-hour day. All the oth ma ters, he held, could go to arbitr on.

At this stage of the contro rsy clear point was scored by the ilroa executives. Elisha Lee, chairma of th Managers' Committee, issued stat ment pointing out that the Pr iden in assuming the championship f th eight-hour day, was really incon sten Such an attitude, Chairman Le tate was not only the equivalent of effo to shorten hours of labor, but so increase the pay of the worke , an both of these were proper subj ts f arbitration.

Up to this time the railroa hav stood firmly for the arbitratio prin ciple, and President Wilson him lf ha declared that he held to thi san principle "with as clear a convict n an as firm a purpose as any one."

The railroad managers insist at th President's attitude in declari th the eight-hour day is not a subj t th can be arbitrated would me th sacrifice of the principle of arbitr ion ind trial disputes. Another point which has een made is that there are at the pre nt time an estimated proportion of t more than 2½ per cent. of the rai ad men who work eight hours, and ha to adopt the eight-hour day gen- era would simply mean a continent- wi advance in railroad men's wages; so at the yielding of the eight-hour da would be nothing more nor less tha granting increased wages, without ref nce to arbitration.

S ll. even with these complications he is a prospect that the whole sit ion may be harmoniously adjusted. Wh the battle has been going on— wit fluctuations now indicating success an again betokening possible failures —t re has loomed up in the background the im suggestion of ultimate action by Co ress. On August 23 the President su noned to the White House the cha men of the Senate and House Co nittees of Interstate Commerce for conference. What was in the tho ht of these chairmen at that m nt may be gathered from a remark of ongressman Adamson, one of the tw nvited: "I don't know when this str will be settled, but I do know if it 't settled, Congress will take a ha to pass an eight-hour law." The qu ion has been raised whether such a lav ould stand a constitutional test; bu he probability seems to be that no suc test will ever have to be applied, as me of the leading railroad executiv are now said to be disposed to gra the eight-hour day; and if by so oing they receive assurances of be r rates and partial arbitration, the may be able to carry with them the en e body of managers.

August 23 three more days were asl l for by the railroad executives in ich to prepare their final reply to the President, and the request was gra ed by Mr. Wilson. After conferen and discussion, the railway preside s and managers on August 24 rea ed a practical agreement as to the reply to the President's proposed set ment of the strike. They were expe d to tell the President on August 25 at they would accept the eight-hour da if the unions would accept a flat eig hours' pay for eight hours' work, wi proportionate pay for shorter ter s of service. It is also intimated th their proposal hinged upon the as ance that Congress would pass the bil dding two members to the Intersta Commerce Commission in order th the enlarged commission might ex dite its work and an application for in ased freight rates might therefore re ve immediate attention, and that pr ision should be made for a permane Federal Arbitration Commission. It vas reported that the la r railroads were still in fa r of refusing the Preside 's proposed settlement, ev if it resulted in a strike, pr rring a strike to surre er, but that many small ra oads felt unable to meet th problem that would be pr nted by a strike at this ti . The suggestion that th President might be led to m ify his proposal at the in tence of railways was rece ed with disbelief in the u n camp and was met by in nations that any variati from the proposal alre y made would mean an in ediate strike. Thus pe e, which seemed certain o unday, became uncertain ag n on Thursday.

ARALYSIS DECREASING. T paralysis epidemic in N York City is beginning to ow a definite response to th efforts that have been m e to conquer it. The da average of cases for the w k shows a further decline bo in the city and in the su ounding districts. The to l of cases up to August 24 in New York City was 7, 0, and of deaths 1,762. T city of New York is arra ging for the aftercare of c pled patients, of which it is stimated there may be in th neighborhood of 5,000.

Uncle Sam, Mariner. The Senate on August 18 passed the bill establishing a Federal Shipping Board, and providing for government owned and built merchant ships. Fifty million dollars, to be raised by the sale of Panama Canal bonds, is to be invested in merchant ships to be leased to operating companies or operated by the government itself, under control of the Shipping Board, in case a necessary trade route does not appeal to private capital.

Compensation for Federal Employees. The Senate on August 19 passed the House bill providing uniform compensation for government employees when disabled, and benefits for their families in case of death. The Federal employees will receive two-thirds wages throughout disability, and will also receive adequate medical attendance. The compensation provided for is to be administered by a commission of three members, who will receive $4,000 a year each.

Chinese Attack Japanese. Following the arrest of a Japanese merchant, Chinese troops on August 15 attacked the Japanese garrison at Chengchiatun, between Mukden and Chaoyangfu. Seventeen Japanese soldiers were killed or wounded, one officer was killed. The Japanese barracks were besieged by the Chinese. Japanese reinforcements were rushed to the help of the beleaguered garrison. The trouble is the outcome of raids by armed bandits and is not expected to result in any international complications. The Chinese and Japanese governments are already in correspondence over the affair.

Purchase of Islands Delayed. Reports from Copenhagen on August 12 indicated that the Folkething (House of Representatives) would probably approve the sale of the Danish West Indies to the United States, but that the Conservative members of the Danish upper house, the Landsthing, appeared to have sufficient power to prevent confirmation. The Folkething ratified the treaty, as was expected, but included in the ratification a provision for a plebiscite, a vote of the people, before the ratification should take effect. Evidence continues to accumulate that ratification will be defeated in the Landsthing. Unfortunately the question of the sale of the islands has become entangled with Danish internal politics and is not being considered on its merits, the Conservative party taking advantage of the proposition of sale to attempt to overthrow the present government. It is said that should the Landsthing defeat the proposition in the Rigsdag (it did on August 24), a general election may be held under the new constitution. The government expects to be able to win control of both houses if it becomes necessary to go before the country, but the King is endeavoring to prevent an election, and is working for the creation of a coalition cabinet which, if he succeeds, will mean probable ratification of the treaty. Because of the delay in ratification abroad the treaty will not be taken up in the U. S. Senate until Congress convenes again in December.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE southeastern (Balkan) front was the center of considerable activity in the middle and latter part of the week (August 17 to 24). Before this offensive, the battle line on this front began on its western end at a point a little north of Florina, almost directly south of Monastir, in southern Serbia, in Greek territory. From this point the line ran slightly northeastward and continuously in Greek territory to Doiran, whence it curved first northerly and then southerly to the Greek town of Seres.

When the attack opened there were approximately 375,000 Bulgarians and Teutons holding this line against an unknown but large force, the estimates of its strength varying from 600,000 to 800,000, of the Allies, with its base at the Greek port of Salonica. This force is a composite one, composed of British and Colonial troops, with some Indians, French regulars and Colonials, Italians, a few thousand Russians, and the reorganized Serbian army.

At the time affairs became active, the Serbians were holding the left wing, approximately twenty-five miles long, the British and French the center for about sixty miles, and the Italians and Russians the right wing, extending over another forty miles. Activities began at a point about forty miles to the east of the eastern end of this line, where a strong force of Bulgarians crossed their southern boundary and moving south through Greek territory cut the railroad line running from Seres to Adrianople, and proceeded south in the direction of the Greek port of Kavala; but the Central Powers gave assurances to the Greek government that Kavala would not be occupied. It therefore seems probable that the object of the Bulgarians in making this move was to secure complete possession of the railroad, which affords an easy and rapid method of moving Turkish troops westward from Constantinople and Adrianople. As soon as the Allies perceived this move on the part of the Bulgarians, they began a general assault all along the main line of battle as described above, and very hot fighting ensued, which is still continuing at this writing. So far the results are apparently, basing them on the French official bulletins, that the Bulgarians have on the left wing driven back the Serbians for a distance of several miles and captured two towns, Florina and Banitsa, formerly within the Serbian lines. In the center, however, where the British and French troops were engaged, the result was different, and the Allies gained considerably in their efforts to force the entrance of the Great Vardar Valley, through which runs the railroad north to Uskub, Nish and Belgrade. On the right wing the fortune of war again changed, and the Allies, who had advanced northward over the Struma River, were driven back and obliged to recross that stream. It may be said, however, that if this is the real beginning of the offensive north from Salonica, which the Allies have long projected, we shall see some very hard fighting on this front. The stake is a high one for both sides, it being imperative for the Teutons to hold their line of communication unbroken with Turkey, and equally important for the Allies to break it.

Rumors that Rumania is shortly to enter the war were very prevalent during the week.

In a naval skirmish which took place in the North Sea during the week, the English sunk two German submarines and lost two light cruisers, the Nottingham and Falmouth, of about 4,000 tons each and twenty-five knots speed. The casualties to the English only amounted to thirty-nine, other British vessels saving the great bulk of the crews. Later in the week a British submarine commander reported that he had successfully torpedoed a German battleship of the Nassau class, later identified as the Westfalen, which Berlin reported as torpedoed, but able to return to port and capable of early repair.

British forces in German East Africa have forced the passage of the Wami River and are approaching the important town of Kicossa.

During the last week of July, the casualties among British officers were heavier than in any previous week of the war: 737 were killed, 1,688 were wounded and 134 missing, a total of 2,659. This would make the casualties to men during the same period, by the time-honored method of computing, thirty men to one officer, about 79,000.

A British loan of $250,000,000 was brought out during the week in the United States. This loan was, however, secured by the deposit of American and other securities owned by British subjects and gathered together by the British for such purpose.

The Austro-Italian front has, on that portion thereof looking toward Trieste, been the scene of some rather fierce fighting, particularly in the region to the east and southeast of Gorizia. In these actions the Italians, anxious to advance their positions, have in the district east of Gorizia assaulted with great violence the Austrian defenses, intervening between Gorizia and the Austrian second line of defense on the Wippach River. Here the battle has raged most fiercely, but without definite results up to the present time, as the Austrians have put up a much more stubborn resistance than was expected, and besides have a considerable advantage in that their artillery covers very completely the ground over which the Italians must advance to the attack up hill. Southeast of Gorizia, on the Carso plateau, the battle is also raging hotly, but in this region the Italians are slowly advancing. In this strife of attack and counter-attack, both sides claim a considerable number of prisoners. On the south Tyrol front there were no important changes of position. The other portions of this Austro-Italian front were featureless.

In the Caucasus the Turks continue to make progress in Persia and in eastern Armenia. In the center the Turks had advanced to a point seventeen miles to the northeast of Mush, but late Russian reports claim the recapture of this important town. Further west the Russians are launching attacks on the Turks. On the eastern front, in spite of the presence of great events which the Russian operations in Galicia last week appeared to hold forth, the week has been very dull, and for several days the bulletins have simply chronicled no changes of importance. The hardest fighting of the week has been along the Stochod line and its prolongation, where the Russians made a two days' effort to force their way across the river, with little success, except at one point where they did attain the western bank, with considerable forces, a position which they claim to have held against determined counter-attacks.

In Galicia, surprising to say, all has been quiet on the front extending around Lemberg. Near Kuty, directly west of Czernowitz, in the foothills of the Carpathians, there has been some minor fighting. It was officially announced during the past week that a force of four Turkish army corps, about 160,000 men, had arrived on this Galician front to aid in Teutonic defense.

The western front was without interest during the past week. On the Picardy front the fighting has, momentarily at least, taken on the character of trench warfare, wherein the capture of a hundred yards of trench becomes a great event.

On the Verdun front, except for a rather animated struggle in the village of Fleury, in which the French added to their holding of these ruins, nothing except artillery duels took place.

The Olive Branch in the Navy Bill

WHEN the Naval Bill, making the largest single appropriation in the country's history, was in the hands of the conference committee, several changes were made, the nature of which became known only after the bill had passed. One of these changes was the insertion of a special provision authorizing the President to suspend naval construction in the event of an agreement to limit armaments being reached by the European powers at the close of the war. Nor is the provision merely the expression of a hope, but it is a positive order to the Executive directing him to call an international conference, should conditions favor, at which disarmament can be discussed and to which he is to appoint nine Americans to represent the United States, the sum of $200,000 being appropriated for the purpose. But the provision goes even further, and stipulates that if such a tribunal should be appointed and its deliberations should produce results that would render the maintenance of competitive armaments unnecessary, then, in such event, the President is empowered to order the suspension of the further building of naval vessels at his discretion.

This remarkable provision in the Navy Bill shows that the peace advocates have not worked altogether in vain. Behind the cloud they see a silver lining. Assuming it to be the purpose of the Administration to work for international disarmament, there is still a possibility that a part, at least, of the huge appropriation which was designed to make our navy the second in world power may never be expended.

It would be, probably, folly to expect that the advocates of preparedness could take this view of the matter. Doubtless they will keep up their clamor and urge haste in carrying out the naval program to its fullest extent. But Congress is not wholly militaristic. Should conditions arise favorable to the reduction of armaments, the proviso in the Naval Bill can be made operative, and we may yet see a policy in favor of armament reduction finding as much enthusiastic support in both houses as the most ardent peace-lover could desire.

Waters of Marah

HE was an aged, white-haired missionary, and had seen service in tropical countries. The best years of his life had been given to the work of winning souls. Familiar with hardship in many forms, yet his heart was light and his soul overflowed with gladness. The meeting, which was little more than "hail and farewell," was one to linger in the memory. "Yes," he said, with a smile lighting up his gray eyes, "we have had our hard times, but always with the bitter was mingled the sweet. You remember how God, while educating his people, led them three days in the wilderness and they found no water. 'And when they came to Marah they could not drink of the waters there, for they were bitter.' Then, as now, that bitterness entered into the people, and they became bitter. Bitter people are unreasonable, and they began to blame Moses; they did not see God's hand or purpose in it. Moses adopted his one solution of every problem, that of crying to the Lord; and it was successful this time also. 'The Lord showed him a tree, and he cast it into the waters, and the waters were made sweet.' Not only was the bitterness taken out, but the waters were actually made sweet; and the sweetness entered into the spirits of the people, and they were made sweet. Now, God still leads his people to their Marahs; it is a part of our training which we cannot do without; but he has a remedy which will turn the bitter into sweet. The tree cast into the waters was the sweetening power of old; and the tree upon which Christ bore our sins is the sweetening power today. If we take this tree into our Marahs, it will certainly make the bitter waters sweet. Our Marahs are places where the Lord has led us, in order to prove and to perfect us; or else he has permitted hard circumstances to surround us. As long as we murmur or blame others, the waters remain bitter; but if we take our troubles to our Master, and ask him to help us, we shall find the bitterness of adversity changed into divine sweetness; divine love and forgiveness will so fill our souls that we shall be able to 'love our enemies,' and to pray 'Father, forgive them.' The fragrance of this sweetness will fill the place, and people will know it is from Jesus, and will seek to have it also."

So speaking, and with a parting smile and a benediction, the old missionary set out on his long voyage to the other side of the world. His going reminded us of the sailing of a gallant ship. Some day, after all the storms have been weathered and the dangers past, the ultimate port will be reached. The message will be wirelessed from the outer harbor to those on shore: "Arrived: good voyage; all's well!" And the old missionary, all his troubles over, his perils passed, his Marahs forgotten, will be welcomed home.

Talking Peace with Mexico

NOW that the membership of our Joint Commission with Mexico has been completed by the recent appointments of Secretary Lane of the Interior, Judge Gray of Delaware, and Dr. John R. Mott as the American members, there is an encouraging prospect that the long-delayed task of reaching an amicable settlement of our differences will at last begin in earnest. Mexico's representatives include men of like distinction, viz.: Luis Cabrera, Minister of Finance; Alberto Paire, president of the Mexican National Railways; and Ignacio Bonillas of the Department of Communications. The high standing and experience of the conferees on both sides give assurance of thoroughness and impartiality. Not only will the commissioners discuss the causes of the border troubles and consider remedies, but it is probable that they will undertake to define the mutual rights of the two countries in future emergencies, as to crossing and recrossing the Rio Grande line. They will also take up the subject of the early withdrawal of our troops, as the first step toward the basis of a lasting agreement between the two countries. There will doubtless be claims and counterclaims presented for discussion, some of them being the outgrowth of Mexican raids on American soil. Mexico's finances will be considered, and incidentally the need of American assistance to smooth the way for the permanent establishment of a government in that republic.

There is talk of keeping our national guardsmen on the border for the next three months. It is difficult to find any good reason for adopting such a plan. Some regard it in the light of politics, while others take the view that the big financial interests demand this, in protection of the $500,000,000 of Mexican railroad securities, $300,000,000 of mining and smelting stock, $125,000,000 of oil stocks, and $50,000,000 of agricultural investments, all held by Americans. Many will question the wisdom of keeping our troops on the border, unless they are actually needed there for protection against any new invasion of American soil, which is not now threatened. Besides, it should be our aim to convince the authorities and people of Mexico of our good faith and the sincerity of our friendly attitude, and this cannot be done by keeping an army of 100,000 troops at the front, where such a huge force is obviously not needed. Nor will it add to the confidence which we should invite from the nineteen other Southern republics, whose leaders will be watchful of our attitude in the coming negotiations, and especially observant of our military dispositions.

Let us lay the foundations of peace in mutual confidence and show Mexico that we mean to trust her and to help her not only to make her government stable and secure, but to enable her to convince her people that the friendship of this republic is the best guarantee of Mexico's future progress.

Starving the Saloon

THE motion picture is blamed by the liquor interests for the dwindling receipts of saloons, which have not yet been reached by the fast spreading wave of the temperance movement. And the motion picture interests blame the saloon interests for the propaganda which has been so insistently pressed in the interest of a Federal censorship of films. The liquor people complain that the film features only the abuses of liquor and that they mislead the public. But if they "mislead" the public into leaving liquor alone, the Christian Herald will most heartily commend them. The moving picture that disgustingly shows the young man in his first debauch, the sordid rottenness of the brothel, the travesty on good fellowship of the half drunken, with its accompaniment of lewd women and the gaming-table, the wreck of everything that goes to make up manhood, is doing the world a good service. It would be impossible to mislead the public as to the real nature of the saloon. The occasional decent place is an exotic that does not belong to the species.

That the institution of a moving picture show adjoining a saloon reduces the income of the saloon and frequently causes it to become unprofitable has been abundantly demonstrated. There are now in the neighborhood of 20,000 motion picture exhibitors in the United States, and the daily attendance is estimated at something like 20,000,000. The laborer who goes to the saloon leaves his family at home (if, perchance, they have a home to be left in), bu he laborer who goes to the moving picture show kes his family along, and the total cost of the eve g's pleasure for them all is less than the amount nat would ordinarily cross the bar, had the moving pi ure show not offered the greater attraction. In ter ory which has gone dry, the motion picture theaters ve noticed an immediate increase in their business In Rochester, Wash., the increase was 14 per cent In Arkansas, in Colorado and Iowa, motion pi ure operators report an increase in attendance afte he closing of saloons running as high as 25 per cent In fact, in Oelwein, Iowa, an exhibitor claims an inc ase of one-third after the closing of the saloon. ere seems, therefore, to be every reason in the world hy the motion pictures should continue to show the l ior business exactly as it is, without being unduly ki to its seamy side.

Religious Freedom

IT seems a hard thing for Catholics, both c ics and laymen, to understand that the intere of church and state are wholly separate in Am ca, and that this principle must necessarily be refl ed in our diplomacy. In the reports presented t he first business session of the great Catholic Conve on in New York was one submitted by the national retary of the American Federation of Catholic Soci es, which detailed the efforts that had been ma to influence our government against granting rec nition to Carranza because of the attitude of his adm istration toward the Catholic Church, which was id to be hostile. The White House and State De rtment were deluged with protests against recogn on. The State Department had explained that the onstitutional government of Mexico had given assur es that life, property and religious belief would b respected, in accordance with the constitution. Be nd this, we had no valid pretext for interference. hat outrages were committed indiscriminately by lla and his bandit followers was due to the anarc cal conditions that prevailed. The worst enemy o aw and order in Mexico, the greatest promoter of reli ous intolerance, proved to be the very man whom arranza has been so long striving to subdue. is worth noting that in the resolution on the su ect adopted by the convention there is a flat denial hat the Catholic Church or its representatives stirre up revolution or fomented disturbances in Mexico nd there is a demand, couched in moderate terms, a guarantee of liberty of conscience and freedo of worship in that republic. This unexpectedly mperate attitude would hardly have been adopt if the convention had seen any good reason for ustaining the charges against the Constitutio ist government that were submitted by the fede ed societies.

The Nation and the Child

IT has taken years of hard effort to secure the m erate measure of reform that is represented b he Child Labor Bill which recently passed th houses of Congress. At first indifferent, then ho le, the defenders of child labor have capitulated less o ng to a sudden wave of public sentiment than t he systematic campaign of education which was b un over ten years ago and has been industriously p secuted ever since. It is a great step forward fo he nation to realize that its best asset is the child, nd that every boy and girl in our progressive repub is entitled not only to the full freedom which na re assigns to childhood, but to an education and tra ng as equipment for the struggle of life. Whe he Christian Herald several years ago showed the nslaved condition of many thousands of children i he New England and Middle States—robbed not ly of the joys of childhood but even of the right go to school, and physically stunted by their labo in the mills and coal breakers—the first steps to rd reform were taken in many places. Schools, ygrounds, leisure periods and sanitary surroun gs were introduced. Such improvements, though lcomed, were only a part of what was needed. he daily press and the magazines have contributed gr ly to the public enlightenment. Now the turning- nt has been reached. American child labor has en condemned by Congress, and all humanity wil be the gainer.

There are other reforms awaiting enactment b re Uncle Sam's family of little ones comes fully int ts own. The Child Bureau in Washington was a ig step toward doing them justice. It had almost ecome a proverb that our government took better re of its cattle than of its children. This reproach n no longer be laid at our door.

THE BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

Conducted by FERDINAND C. IGLEHART D.D.

Fa m Cost Twenty-five Cents

A FEW miles from Spokane, Wash., is the Colville Indian Reservation, which is gradually being thrown open to settlement as the ndians diminish. Recently a drawing or 1,500 farms of 160 acres each wa opened by the government. There we ninety thousand registrations at a f of twenty-five cents, and the first far was drawn by George Lennon, a yo g farm laborer of Spokane. In the old countries of Europe all un imed land belongs to the kir but in our Republic, on the pri iple that the land belongs to he people, the government aw ds new territory by lot to the applying. But after all, th rize-winner does not become the actual owner until he has wo ed the land and made it his y he right of labor. The gener ty of our government cannot be compared with the munif nce of God, who has given the whole earth to his children to ll it and beautify it until it ret ts not only their industry, bu his loving care as well. Of ou first parents it was said: " d God blessed them, and God a unto them, be fruitful, and m iply, and replenish the earth, an subdue it." (Gen. 1 : 28.)

The King Beggar

A RECENT exchange tells of the organization of the begga in China. There are countles numbers of them, and by th importunity along the streets an upon the door-steps of the we thy they are a constant so ce of annoyance. But they ar accepted by the country as a cessary part of its life. They ha a king in each of the large ci s, and through him a certain co rol can be exercised for a fair fin cial return. He is always in ted to wedding feasts and ot r important social gatherin . He comes and begs from al he guests, but in return keeps ot r mendicants away. Such a b gar chief often makes as much as 15,000 a year, and out of this h oays the common street begga to keep away from social ga erings. All through the East t beggar is an accompaniment of he pagan systems of religion, w ch makes much of almsgiving t ecure merit for the worshiper. W erever religion is unspiritual w find the same symptoms as in J us' day, when the Jews, instead of worshiping in the heart, m le up their religious life with o ward observances, pilgrimages, a sgiving, fasting, and prayers w h "much repetition." These m k the religions of the East t ay as they are practiced by t common people. Even in our o n country there are many who g to the poor and to the church f m this selfish motive of gaini merit, and to all such Jesus said: " ake heed that ye do not your alms b re men, to be seen of them. . . . Do n sound a trumpet before thee . . . t at thine alms may be in secret; and thy F her which seeth in secret shall himself r ard thee openly." (Matt. 6 : 1–4.)

Daylight-Saving

UNDER the terrible economic pressure the countries of Europe one a er another are now adopting a scheme o setting ahead all official time one h r at the beginning of summer and readjusting it again at the end of the summer. The purpose is to make people rise an hour earlier and thus save this most valuable part of the day. At the end of the day, too, an hour of sunlight is saved, either for more work or for recreation. Ever since the modern world has timed its activities by the clock men have realized the imperfection of this mechanism to keep with the sun in its varying hours of light throughout the different seasons of the year. Many plans have been offered, but scientific opinion has always vetoed them. Strangely enough, many people were prejudiced against the plan for moral reasons, thinking it dishonest, but in reality it is a public attempt to make the watches tell better when the summer day does truly begin and end. England and several of the Continental countries have adopted the plan, and the world is watching with interest to see whether it will be found practicable. It was adopted for economic reasons. This effort to gain more working hours with which to prepare to vanquish one another in war reminds us of Joshua's battle with the Amorites: "And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies." (Joshua 10 : 13.)

Are We Law-Mad?

THIS question is raised by an investigator who finds that in the last five years our lawmakers have put upon the statute books a total of 62,550 new laws. After making due allowance for a large number of these that are constructive and not prohibitory, it is plain that our representatives in state and national legislatures are taking their work a little too seriously. Many of these laws were never intended to be enforced, but the machinery for the administration of the rest must ever become more ponderous and burdensome in our national life. The hopelessness of any legal system for making character stands out in dark contrast with the radiant simplicity of Christ's program. He had only two "laws," and their enforcement was voluntary in the heart of man. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart . . . Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." (Matt. 22 : 37–40.)

The Scout Balloon

THE rapid development of motor-driven aeroplanes in the last few decades has quite driven the balloon and the kite principles of flying out of the field of popular attention, but the Great War, with its faculty for drafting into service every available power of earth and sky, has found a most important work to be done by the type of kite-balloon seen above. Kites had never been put to much practical use until Benjamin Franklin made his famous experiments with electricity by this means, though as toys they had been known for many centuries in China and Japan, where the boys become remarkably proficient in controlling their movements with a slender cord. In 1895 General Baden-Powell constructed some man-lifting kites, which have since then been a part of the British army equipment for purposes of observation. Balloons were also used for this purpose in our Civil War, but not with any very marked success. Now the modern type of the kite-balloon is seen frequently above the armies and fortifications of the European battlefields. It is a most effective means of conducting observations of the actions of an enemy. While the aeroplanes are flying upon raids and scouting in new territory the kite balloon is stationed far above danger at an elevation of some five thousand feet and about three miles behind the firing line. It, of course, is anchored below to a truck or a battleship as the case may be. Its work is not so spectacular, but is perhaps even more important. Under the great balloon, which is of a neutral color, yellowish green, there is suspended a tiny basket hung by manila cordage, and in this are two occupants, whose duty it is to report every action of the enemy seen through their powerful field glasses, and also to direct the firing of the artillery, whose only guidance is the knowledge thus gained by the scouts far aloft. The excessive noise of all air machines makes communication by telephone difficult, but the kite balloon is equipped with either wired or wireless telephone, and the operator can instantly report every detail of his observations to any of the headquarters. From the maker, The Goodrich Rubber Company, of Akron, Ohio, the Ohio National Guard has received a new model kite balloon, shown in the picture, as a gift. It is the only one owned by the militia in the United States. The air service is the eye of the army and navy in modern warfare. It has superseded the scouting work of the cavalry and with much greater efficiency. Surprises by the enemy are now almost impossible. The Hebrews always thought of God as dwelling in the heavens, from whence he directed and watched over them. In their journey into the promised land they were guided and protected from enemies by the pillar of cloud and of fire. "And the Lord went before them by day in a pillar of a cloud, to lead them the way; and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light." (Ex. 13 : 21.)

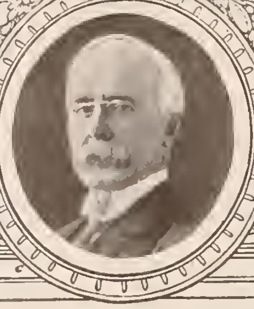
Digs Up Ancient Tenement

IN Southeastern Colorado, some distance from any known remains of the ancient Aztec peoples, Mr. J. W. Fewkes has now discovered and partially excavated the ruins of a settlement of an interesting and civilized race who inhabited our continent ages before the white men came. Mr. Fewkes has found a large community dwelling-house three stories high and shaped like the letter D. No weapons of any sort were found among the utensils in the building, and it is supposed that this town on the plains of the Mesa Verde National Park belonged to a still earlier time, before the Indians were driven to the high plateaus for safety from other tribes. We owe much to the pick and shovel of the patient excavators who rediscover for us the life of the ancients and shed such informing light on so many questions of anthropology. No people like to think of oblivion, but to the Hebrew it seemed to have an especial horror, and the worst threat of the prophets was that God would punish the cities for their wickedness by burying them under the sand of time. "And Jerusalem shall become heaps." (Micah 3 : 12.)

Removing Fog Dangers

SCIENTISTS from the Smithsonian Institution who have been experimenting with electricity in the raising of fog along the California coast now report that they have been able to get good results. High tension wires are hung, and when the ship approaches a fog bank the current is turned on. It is said that the fog for a considerable distance around the boat is lifted and clear water and sky can be seen. The mariner has to face many dangers, and does so with a bravery that commands the honor of all landsmen, but of all his perils he dreads none so much as the billows of mist and fog that pour in upon his ship, shutting off the sun from his observations, hiding the shoals, the land and the passing ship, and leaving him helpless against impending disaster. Other dangers he can prepare for and struggle against, but not so this fearful enemy. Fog banks infest the shores of the moral life for individuals and for nations. False philosophies create an unwholesome atmosphere and leave multitudes groping in the darkness of indecision. Just now our whole nation is trying to feel its way through the mists of the European war to a safe and right policy toward war and peace, but we are still largely in the fog, and there is needed some authoritative light from heaven to dispel it and to point the way in which we as a people should walk. The light of Scripture will make the path clear for any one, and if a nation is willing to trust itself to God's guidance it too may know the pathway of life. With the illumination of the Holy Spirit in our hearts we shall find the mysteries of life cleared away each day sufficiently for us to go ahead toward our true harbor. "He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." (John 8 : 12.)

What Does the Gospel Mean to You?



A SERMON

By

*REV. J. H. JOWETT, M.A.

TEXT—Col. 1:5-6: "The word of the truth of the Gospel, which is come unto you."

"THE truth of the Gospel," God-spell, the God-speech, the God-story, the story of the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord! The Gospel—all the hints of light, all the gracious evangels which find expression in the incarnation, the atonement, the resurrection, the exaltation of Christ our Saviour! The Gospel—the unveiling of the Eternal, the light of his countenance, the voice of grace and of love and of pleading, the home-call. "The Gospel, which is come unto you." Is it worth anything? What value do we place upon it? Have its assumptions been confirmed by experiment, or have its claims been overthrown? Is the Gospel like some of those dogmatic nostrums which are to be found buried in obsolete medical text-books, and which are now exploded and rejected? Is the Gospel only a worn-out medical theory, which served its little day, or is it as permanent and indispensable as air and light and water and bread? Does it touch the need it professes to remove? Is it worth a proclamation? Does it deserve transmission?

The man who first touches the secret of a dreaded disease and confronts it with some invincible antagonist will not hide his discovery in selfish silence; he will proclaim it from the house-tops, and the evangel will be shouted to the ends of the earth! And if to us, my brethren, there has come a remedy for needs more appalling than the pangs and ravages of disease, even for the corruptions and afflictions of the soul, shall we hide the revelation in selfish silence, or shall we give it universal proclamation, that all the ends of the earth may see the glory of our God? The Gospel has come to us; is it worth transmission?

WHAT does the Gospel claim to do? What does it claim to have done? I am more and more amazed at the unflinching boldness of its splendid professions. It quietly confronts the three most stupendous presences in human life—sin, and sorrow, and death—and it confidently proclaims its powers of conquest. It does not address itself to surface-work, to superficial dressings of external sores; it proclaims a ministry which is radical, fundamental, absolute, and which results in perfect triumph. It has no competitor in the field. There is criticism, but no competition.

The three dark presences in this world are sin, and sorrow, and death. Is there any ministry dealing with these except the ministry of the Gospel of Jesus? I want to know where the competitors are who are addressing themselves to the burdensome bondage of guilt and sin. I want to know what other evangel there is that is singing to the broken heart. I want to know what other light there is, accompanying men into the chilling mists and shadow of death. The Gospel of Jesus claims to come with the grace of forgiveness, with the power of salvation, and to break up the empire and bondage of sin in irreparable confusion. It claims to bring a transfiguring ray into the presence of sorrow, to set a rainbow in the tearful sky, to make the yoke easier and the burden light. It claims to come into the darkening presence of death, to set in the life an eastern window, to unfold the dawning of a new day, to turn "good-by" into "good-night," and to kindle the cheering hope of reunion and immortality. This Gospel has come to us; is it worth transmission?

NOW, let us walk the ground again with more vigilant deliberation. It is a Gospel in the presence of sin. It confronts the most tyrannous and galling bondage in the spirit of exulting hope. It announces itself as the emancipator, giving "liberty to them that are bruised," and "opening the prison to them that are bound." It addresses itself equally to those who are imprisoned in sheer animalism, and those whose servitude is gilded by comparative refinement.

I am not quite sure whether I ought to make this distinction. It seems to make very little difference whether a man's chains be made of iron or of gold. Some men appear to be bound with a vulgar cart-rope; others seem to be equally enslaved with multitudinous cords of vanity. There is Caliban, and there is Apollo, both needing emancipation, and the Gospel proffers its ministry to both and promises their redemption. There is Caliban, more than half a beast, sunk and buried in animalism, finding a grave in his own flesh. Has anything been done for Caliban? Why, Mr. Dauncey told me that out in his church in New Guinea, some of his senior deacons were erstwhile cannibals! You could find similar trophies in the New Hebrides! Don't let that statement pass without bringing to bear upon it the ministry of an alert imagination. Think what it means—the once-while cannibals now sober, reverent, dignified servants and leaders in the Church of Jesus Christ! The sleeping angel has been awaked, the fleshly passions have been restrained, the man has leaped into his rightful sovereignty, and the beast has been bitten and subdued. But I do not go only to New Guinea and the New Hebrides for evidences of the redemption of Caliban; they are to be found within our own land. Every month I have sent to me the literature of the Salvation Army, and it constitutes a veritable "Acts of the Apostles" in its marvelous stories of spiritual emancipation. It is the Salvation Army which is principally engaged in the ministry of redeeming our Caliban. And have they any trophies to show? Have they any redeemed Calibans? I am amazed at their triumph. Their ranks are full of them!

My labor and ministry are cast in another sphere, but my faith in the regenerating power of the Gospel of Christ is month by month enriched as I read and hear the stories of their conquests. It is blind stupidity of us to sit at home and shape our theories, and say it cannot be done. Let us leave our indolent theorizing, and go out and inspect the field. Let no one theorize, and treat Caliban with evasion. The theorist, in all his reckonings, must account for the redemption of the beast.

BUT the Gospel not only proclaims its power in the redemption of Caliban, but also in the emancipation of Apollo. It claims to be able to convert cold refinement into ardent virtue. It claims to be able to change superficial glitter into a deep and radiant warmth. It claims to be able to transform a frosty and perilous passivity into the purifying ministry of a passionate love. And what it claims to do it has done. It has changed self-conceit into cleansing aspiration. It has changed vanity into fruitful lowliness. It has changed self-aggressiveness into eager philanthropy. It has changed the hard heart into a place of broad streams and rivers of soft and flowing sympathies. These things I know. I "testify that I have seen, and give witness of that I have heard." The miracle is being worked every day. Our eyes are so fastened to other things that we do not see it. Twelve months ago, two young fellows were brought into consecrated fellowship with the Lord. They set themselves, in eager, loving purpose, to win every man in the workshop to the Master. Today every man in the workshop, save one, is living the new life in Christ. Again I speak that which I do know, and testify that I have seen. Brethren, this Gospel has come to us; it is worth transmission?

BUT now, let me take you a step further. The Gospel has not only put into our midst redeemed characters; it has through the redeemed characters sweetened and purified the common life. Some eight years ago one of our distinguished statesmen coined the phrase "psychological climate." I thought it a very happy phrase. What is his suggestion? It suggests that just as we are inevitably born into a certain quality of native air so we are inevitably born into a certain quality of surrounding thought. The lungs breathe a certain provided atmosphere and so does the mind. We imbibe common thought as we imbibe common air. Therefore when we speak of the influence of the Gospel we must not only count redeemed man, we must pay regard to redeemed atmosphere. We may not oursleves be redeemed, but we simply cannot escape breathing an air which has been purified and sweetened by redemption. My brethren, in this land of ours we may refuse to be the Master's disciples, but we cannot avoid touching the hem of his garment. The ample robes sweep through our land and everything gains by the touch. Christ has touched our homes, he has touched our privileges and freedom, our literature and art, our music and our architecture. We cannot get away from him. The influence of redeemed men and women is in the very air we breathe.

There is many a man who affects to sneer at religion and to regard its ministry as effeminate or effete whose very liberty is the fruit of the Gospel an who owes every worthy element in his being to the ra ant and beneficent influence of the redeemed child n of God! I am reminded of a quaint phrase whic fell from the lips of Andrew Fuller: "After grazing the pastures of revelation, they boast of having wn fat by nature." And I will quote another word om one of the great poets of our time: "I fear hat when we indulge ourselves in the amusement of ing without a religion, we are not, perhaps, aware ow much we are sustained by an enormous mass re-ligious feeling and religious conviction." It so we cannot escape the Christian deposit of past en-erations! We are breathing an air which is pa lly Christianized, and the impregnation make for liberty, and sympathy, and reverence and th. Where else can you find the same invigorating ir? It is only to be found in Gospel climes, wher the Saviour is known, and where the redeemed ve walked with him in white. "Show me a pla in this planet," says Lowell—"show me a place i his planet, ten miles square, where a decent man ca ive in decency, comfort, and security, supporting nd educating his children unspoiled and unpollut a place where age is reverenced, infancy resp ed, womanhood honored, and human life held in lue regard—when skeptics can find such a place en miles square, on this globe, where the Gospel of C ist has not gone and cleared the way and laid the fou la-tion, and made decency and security possible, i ill then be in order for the skeptics to move th er. and then ventilate their views." My brethren his Gospel has come unto us; is it worth transmis n?

IT is a Gospel for the presence of sorrow. I ow not how to speak about this except to the redee ed. It is an experience which can only be suggeste it cannot be defined. When the robes of sorrow ap themselves around the redeemed like a chilling st, what is the saving element in their conscious ss? Just this, the Gospel evangel, that they are not a ie, that the chill hour is also the dwelling-place o he divine. "When thou passest through the wat I will be with thee." That is the saving presenc by which sorrow is transfigured. The Father kn s! The sorrow is all measured! He will render i n-nocuous; yea, he will transform it into advan ge, and convert it into my friend:

"Fairer than morning, lovelier than the dayl it, dawns the sweet consciousness, I am with t e." Brethren, this Gospel is come unto us; is it w th transmission?

IT is a Gospel in the presence of death! I t nk of the wail of the bereaved that moves all r nd the earth like the night-moan of the great p. Then I think of the wonders wrought by the G el in the fearful presence of death. I turn to An w Bonar's diary; I instinctively turn to those blee ng pages where he records the loss of his wife. " st night, most suddenly, my dear wife was taken m me. As our old family servant said, she 'slipt to glory' at a quarter to ten." Let me turn the f. "The torrent is now settling into a calm river. y soul is finding real sweetness in the Lord, and in e hope set before me. The Lord could not have e it more tenderly. . . . And the day of resurre on is ever coming nearer and nearer." Is that calm ss of no value? Is that fine courage of no price? at dark night has now an east where the gray lin of dawn are already appearing, the harbingers of et al day! Christ hath brought "life and immortalit to light." So not "good-by, but good-night, good-ni t: we all shall meet in the morning light." This G el has come unto us; is it worth transmission? It a Gospel in the presence of sorrow. It is a G el in the presence of death! This gospel is ours; at are our obligations?

Do you come in a godly succession? Had y a father or mother who lived near to the Master, d who, before they went home, solemnly blessed , and dedicated you to the Lord? What is it wo ? Has your sorrow been transfigured? In the v y of the shadow have you felt the comfort of his rod d his staff? What is it worth? Have you a calm, br t outlook on the morrow? Can you see the glean g of the eternal lights? What is it all worth? it all worth a little sacrifice? The world needs the s e evangel. Will you withhold or give it? Let ur response register your decision in sacrifice, that o far as in you lies, the blessing that has come to u shall be shared to the ends of the earth.

Organs of Humanity

SUNDAY, September 10. I Cor. 12 : 25. "The members should have the same care one for another." Every member of the body is to be the instrument of the body. One man is as the eye of the corporate body, and it is his sacred function to look and watch in the interests of the body. Another man is as an ear, and it is his holy office to be a t and listening in the interests of the body. Every member is to be a social minister. No one's personality is to be used as an instrument of selfishness but as an organ of humanity.

Now, it would seem as if the smaller circle is the realm of surest happiness and freedom. The wider the circle the larger will be the gathering ground of sorrows and cares. Might it not therefore be an act of worldly wisdom just to close our eyes and shut our ears, or exercise them only in the tiny area of our own affairs? "I want that widow well out of my ears, with her ailing and wailing!" Very well, just turn a deaf ear, and you make your escape. And that cry from Macedonia! How troublesome is this wail from the larger circle! And, if we heed it, it will probably lead to increased burdensomeness and fiercer persecution. The folk in Troas who do not hear the cry have the happier and easier lot! Very well, then; just close your ears, and very soon you will not hear the pathetic cry, and Macedonia will have ceased to exist. Surely, we have this way of escape! We can shut out the body and be at rest.

The reckoning is altogether false. In the smaller circle we may possibly find an ignoble ease. But ease is not peace. Ease is just the indolence of the beast: peace is the holy restfulness of the saint. Ease is the stupor born of perverted relations: peace is the harmony of right relations. Ease is the condition of degeneracy: peace is the condition of growth. Whenever any power is used as an instrument of ease and selfishness, there is inevitable degradation. Everything shrinks in the smaller circle, yes, even my capacity for the enjoyment which I am so anxious to retain.

The larger circle is our purposed sphere and home. The cry from Macedonia may lead us into new distresses, but it will also lead us into newer wealth in human fellowships, and it will give us larger access into the unsearchable riches of Christ.

Fellowship with God

MONDAY, September 11. Ex. 19 : 1–12. "Moses went up unto God." We also would be often on the mount with God, in familiar fellowship, as a man speaketh unto his friend. This fellowship grew very rapidly. There are seven distinct incidents in his prayer-life connected with their stay at Sinai, until for the seventh time he was invited to ascend and stand in an alcove, sheltered by the divine hand, while the majestic procession swept down the mountain-rent.

This fellowship had an ennobling effect upon his character. Not only did his face shine, his life shone also. There was a supernatural grace and beauty about his aspect and demeanor which clearly marked him out as a man of God. His meekness, his gentleness under provocation, his jealousy for the name and cause of God, burnt with an intenser and more permanent heat. Such intimacy cannot be built up in a day. It begins with the habitual reference of all to God as was Moses' habit in Egypt. But it moves to more and longer periods of communion; and it ends in days and nights of intercession, waiting, and holy intercourse.

Ah, what patterns are seen on the mount! What cries are uttered there! What visions are seen there! What revelations are made there! What injunctions are received there! How great a loss it is for those that forfeit such intimacy, or at the best are content to stand with the elders on the lower level, and see the paved work of sapphire stone beneath God's feet! Let us seek for the closer access, the nearer vision, the more intimate face-to-face intercourse, which is permitted to those who are no longer called servants but friends.

Telling Our Friends Their Faults

TUESDAY, September 12. I Cor. 13 : 4, 7. "Love suffereth long and is kind; . . . beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." Is it Christian to reprove our friends and acquaintances for their faults? If so, when? and how? These questions might make good topics for discussion in a Bible class.

Test the matter by the teaching and acts of Christ, or by the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians. Certain Bible passages, like Gal. 6 : 1, seem to give warrant for the attempt of trying to reprove or restore our brethren who are overtaken in a fault; but warning is given that this correction should be given only by the "spiritual," and in a "spirit of gentleness, looking to thyself, lest thou also be tempted."

We all know certain good people who say, "I think it my duty to tell —— of his fault. It's hurting his usefulness." And frequently the person corrected is big enough to accept the criticism and try to amend his weakness. Yet the possibilities of losing the confidence or friendship of the one reproved depends largely upon the circumstances or the spirit in which the "plain truth" is given. The flesh is weak, and it is frequently difficult to feel at ease again in the presence of one who has uncovered to us our faults.

As a general working principle in such matters, the New Testament law of love is probably the best guide. "Do unto others . . . " It is well to remember also that while the precepts of the Master dwelt at length upon the need of loving and supplying comfort to people, there is very little said about lecturing people, or picking out their faults for judgment.

There is a beatitude for the pure in heart and also for the peacemaker, but no beatitude for the reprover.

Little of use comes through spoken or inferred disapproval, if it is not rooted in love. Suffering long and being kind is sometimes the best way. When in doubt, we might with profit study the method of Jesus with his disciples.

Abundant Blessing in Answer to Prayer

WEDNESDAY, September 13. Ex. 32 : 25–35. "And Moses returned unto the Lord and said . . ." When the day of sharp retribution was over and the awful reaction had set in on his people and himself, Moses announced his intention of going up unto the Lord on their behalf. He was set on obtaining release for them from the consequence of their sin, and he began his intercession by confessing its enormity: "Oh, this people have sinned a great sin, and made for themselves gods of gold." Then he suggested what he had not courage to ask for in so many words. He put the matter before God conditionally: "Yet now, if thou wilt forgive their sin—" He could not finish the sentence, but was content to throw it out as a suggestion; and in case it could not be entertained, he went so far as to offer himself as an atonement. In their previous converse, God had used the word atonement, and had doubtless explained its meaning; and Moses used it as part of his plea.

But God did exceeding abundantly above all that he asked or thought, as the sequel proved. A man may ask much, but he can think more. When tides of strong emotion are sweeping over his soul, when the patriot is pleading for his country, or the father for his child, God always does exceeding abundantly above what we ask or think. It is his Spirit in us who encourages us to pray, and bears us along in prayer, and groans within us with groanings that cannot be uttered; but God always exceeds. He desires no argument, no lure, no sacrifice from us; he loves to give good things to those who ask. It is more blessed for God, as for us, to give than to receive. And if ever he seems reluctant, it is only intended to lead us to take up a position of prevailing and self-surrendered prayer which in its selflessness takes heaven by storm.

Superstitions as Stumbling-Blocks

THURSDAY, September 14. I Tim. 1 : 4. "Neither to give heed to fables." In the letters to Timothy, to Titus and in II Peter, warning is given concerning giving place to fables, which tend to cloud truth and reason.

One needs to travel in the East to appreciate the requirement of such warnings, for Eastern customs are more or less permeated with superstitions signs and omens, which take strong hold upon many people. If in Egypt you should take undue notice of a small child, the parent will often snatch it away suddenly in fear of the "evil eye." It is well known how the Chinese, even the viceroys and mandarins, always built their screens inside the doorways to ward off the evil spirits, which were supposed to fly only in straight lines, and, striking this screen, would be deflected from entering the house.

Here in this Christian land we are not utterly free from the "hold of superstitious vanities"—"thirteen at the table"—"Friday an unlucky day"—"seeing the moon over the proper shoulder"—"knocking on wood." Much of this may be a kind of half frolicsome custom, yet we find these superstitions taking hold upon the fancy of even-learned and serious persons. It is said that the erudite Dr. Johnson was always careful to step out of doors right foot first.

Real belief in such silly observances is doubtless waning, and it is encouraging that this is true; for adhesion to such fables means, if we stop to think of it, that we believe in some whimsical or blind providence, which takes delight in upsetting our plans or playing upon us evil tricks.

It is beneath a Christian's dignity, and certainly contrary to his belief in a loving heavenly Father, to be superstitious; for it assumes that God is somehow at the mercy of traitorous spirits, who play pranks with us when Providence is not on guard. Furthermore, superstitious fears are inclined to grow upon one who admits them for serious company. The danger is real enough to have signals set against superstition in many places in the Bible. "Neither to give heed to fables."

Prayer Calms the Angry Heart

FRIDAY, September 15. Num. 12 : 1–16. "And Moses cried unto the Lord, saying, Heal her, O God, I beseech thee." Moses was very meek in his forbearance of the attack made on him by his sister. He did not call on God to interpose by some sudden stroke of vengeance, but quietly held his peace. It was not weakness, however, but strength that enabled him to act thus. When our Lord was reviled in the judgment-hall he reviled not again, revealing the strength gotten through prayer and the angel's strengthening touch. It is the weak man who gives blow for blow, who blurts out his wrath, who cannot control his passion. Only the strong man can be perfectly still under provocation, holding himself in, and turning the vehemence of his soul into the heat of an intense love. It is recorded of Elijah that he was a man of like passions with ourselves, but he prayed; that is, he turned his passion into prayer. This is the supreme resource of all heated spirits—let them pray.

It was thus that Moses acted. He prayed for Miriam, who had despitefully used him, and this kept him calm and sweet. The brother's pity overcame the leader's pride. What he refrained from uttering in human ears he poured into the ear of God. Not hot words of anger, but words of hot, pleading intercession. Let us learn thus to transmute the force of our indignation into fervent and importunate intercession. We may begin to do it as a duty, in obedience to the law of Christ, but shall soon find it as snow on a fevered forehead, cooling and soothing the soul.

Do not wait to feel moved in this direction; act, and as you act aright you will begin to feel aright! Unworthy thoughts will sink as silt in the muddied lake, and your heart will again reflect God's blue heaven of love.

What It Means to Carry Our Cross

SATURDAY, September 16. Mark 15 : 21. "And they compelled one Simon to bear his cross." Jesus' body was subject to weariness and illness like our own. His night of agony in the garden before the court of trial had produced great physical exhaustion. He bore the greater cross of the world's sin and salvation on his soul, without sinking, but the wooden cross was too heavy for his weakened body. No other could bear his heart cross, as Simon did that ot the bodily load.

We think we should like to have been in Simon's place, helping the Master in the awful hour of his suffering; but we may help him more now by taking up our cross daily and following him. Our cross is to surrender self and live for Christ and humanity. We are not forced to bear this cross except by the compulsion of love. Bearing the cross means to us life more abundantly and a crown of glory. Jesus' cross means to him the infinite bliss of loving lost men, the joy of seeing a race of immortals redeemed by his blood.

How heartless were the men who were hurrying Christ up Calvary's summit! They would not give him a word of sympathy nor a hand of help. They refused to bear the wooden burden, putting it upon an innocent man. Their evil hearts would crush the Christ, rather than aid him in his mission to save a world. Jesus used his all power, praying for his persecutors, rather than saving himself.

"Use the Boys Right"

Transcribed by
REMINGTON SCHUYLER

"I'VE been thinking over all the boys who used to go to the old schoolhouse the same time that I used," said my gray-haired friend.

"And much as I'd like to think different, I'll have to admit that the ones that stuck to the land be the best off, taking it 'button for button.'

"You see, Charlie he's been pestering at me to come down to the city to see him. Every once in a while he'd drop me a card. Finally I went. Charlie he met me to the train.

"'First off,' he said, 'let's go into the tavern and get a little 'eye opener.' 'No,' said I, 'Charlie, you know I got no use for such stuff.'

"Well, up to Charlie's everything looked kind of old like. Kind of plumb wore out. The house didn't look as though it'd had a cent spent on it a long while. Neither did the furniture —nor Charlie's wife. Come to look at Charlie, he didn't look so brand new either.

"Well, after a bit I says, 'Charlie, you'd better get along to your job. I'll just visit here with Emily till you come back.' So off goes Charlie. When he's gone Emily she asks, 'How's work in the country, Ford?'

"When I tell her we're pretty shorthanded for men and boys, she bursts out with, 'Oh, I wish we'd never come to this awful city at all. I do so long for the country. This summer it's been powerful hot here in town. So often I've wished and wished we could be back on the old place. You know Charlie's only had eleven days' work this month. Nowadays he don't get nigh so much pay as he used to. The shops want young men, and men who don't drink.'

"That was Charlie and his wife.

"THEN I saw Bob. He's cashier in the bank. He lives in the nice part of the town, nice house, pretty lawn and a fine bunch of young folks.

"That night when we got to talking Bob says, 'Ford, I'd give anything to get back to the land.'

"'What!' says I, 'You have a fine home and everything's going well.'

"He smiled sort of a crooked smile. 'Yes; fine—fine. When I pay the rent and pay the coal bill, and the servant and the grocer and the butcher and the gas company, and pay for the clothes for us all, how much do you think I can lay away? Just about nothing. To hold my job, I have to live decently. And living decently in the city means spending about what you make—and I'm getting along in years, you know, Ford.

"'Every day I get to the bank at 8.30 and I'm there till 6 P.M. What's more, I have to be there, year in, year out. The same old mechanical routine.

"'Some one to boss me all the time. And I've given faithful service. But tell me, how has Jabez Beckwith gotten along? It's been ten years since he came in here to arrange the mortgage when he bought the old White place on part payment. It surprised me when he paid it off so soon.'

"'Why,' says I, 'he's doing right well, him and his boy. They've specialized in registered stock and Grade A milk. It's paying big. His boy, Jabez, Jr., went through Agricultural College. It was hard sledding for a while, but last year they cleared over and above all expenses just twenty-two hundred dollars.

"'They've the finest-looking place on the turnpike. You'd never know it, Bob. Remember how the old White place was an eyesore? It's as pretty as a picture now. Twin silos back of the barn. Concrete work all through the dairy. Everything spotless. It's good to look at, Bob.'

"AFTER Bob's, I spent several days looking up all the old school fellows. It was kind of sad. Out of twelve one had made good. He was manager of a big concern. His company handle produce; butter, eggs and such like.

"But he was complaining that the parcel post was cutting into the commission merchants pretty hard. He said all the laws were being made to help the farmers.

"He said that if they kept on the way they had been here lately, his company might just as well take down their sign and quit.

"So I said, 'Well, why don't you quit and go to farming, Lem?'

"Said he, 'Come over here into my private office and I'll tell you a secret. Ford,' he said, 'I've figured it out. The city needs the country with its farms and farmers, but the country could get along without the cities and be a heap better off. This is real dope. What do you think I'm doing with my spare money! I'll tell you. Putting it—every cent—into the finest little farm you ever saw. It's a beauty. It's on a lake. Thirty acres of fruit. This year they picked fifteen tons of cherries off it. Twenty acres of alfalfa, and some silo corn. At present I have only three cows. But they are registered stock. They make milk and lots of it. Their calves are worth a good many hundreds of dollars. In a few years I'll be able to sell registered stock. Ford,' he says, 'there's nothing like a nice little farm. Not too big—just right. It's taken me twenty years to find that out. But when this commission business falls to pieces (as it is going to do), and the farmers get together and get all the profit, why, there'll be no better business in the world than just plain scientific farming.'

"It surprised me how terribly heated up he was over it. If you had known how calculating and quiet a man he generally is, it would have surprised you, just as it did me.

"He went on; 'I'm buying where the money is going to grow big.' There's not so much free land in the United States any more. What land we have, we'll have to get more off of. Intensive farming—that's what we're snubbed up against.'

"THAT night I sat thinking and thinking. The more I studied, the bigger the proposition got to be. Next day I came back home. I went over to see Hiram Van Hee. His is the big farm down on the flats. The house the red chimney running up the side.

"'Well,' said Hi, when we go talking, 'there's just two problem work out. One's keeping the boy the land, the other's getting a-hol the consumer direct. When we those, this United States will be finest, richest country in the world.

"'Why,' says I, interrupting, have solved the first; and with large parcel post shipments it st me you've nearly solved the sec

"'Yes, am solving it. Will solve it in time,' said he.

"'How did you keep a-hold of boys and make them stay?'

"'Well, let's see. You know I al believed in paying the boys somet for their work. Sometimes when were small it was only a little. it was always something.

"'At first I gave them a chicke two. My! how they used to fuss their pets! Later when they got older I gave them each a calf for own. They tended them so ca like, and when they got to giving the boys had the profit from them.

"'About the time they finished trict school, I gave them each an of land, as payment for their sum work.

"'Each planted this acre to suit own fancy. You'll be surprised I tell you that each of them ra enough potatoes on his acre to pay all his clothes. They certainly enj the spending of that money. It ta them the value of it. Many an eve they planned and consulted over kind and quality they would get. T too, they bought a whole lot of b on farming and soils. Some they into fertilizers for the next year.

"'So each year I added another to each boy's miniature farm. eldest boy with his earnings the sec year was able to put himself throu short term agricultural course at district agricultural school.

"'The boys studied and planned planned over their little farms. cidentally I learnt more from them I ever taught them.

"'By the time they'd grown up had bought more land, and what what I'd given them, they had the ginnings of farms. I used to lend t the teams and the implements. the two eldest are all started Ford.'

"'It must have cut pretty deep your farm, Hiram,' I suggested.

"'Yes, mighty deep,' he said, ch ling. 'All of seventeen acres.'

"'But it was cheap. Look at first-class help I had all those ye You couldn't buy that kind of h And what's more, I'm glad I got of some of the old farm. In the Distance

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

BLUE mountains in the distance and sunlight on the road,
And heavy wagons creaking beneath a fragrant load;
The humming of a bee song, the bluish-purple haze,
That hangs below the sky line on pensive autumn days.

Blue mountains in the distance, their summits touched with white,
That glows like dust o' diamonds with frosty, gleaming light;
As if the summer's languor and winter's chilling blast
Were lingering together, and making friends at last.

Blue mountains in the distance, pale shadows on the grass,
And winds that breathe the secrets of heaven as they pass;
The whole wide world seems singing a dreamy harvest song.
What though the cold is coming? The autumn days are long!

BLUE mountains in the distance, and oh, I wish that I Might see once more their outlines serene against the sky;
For though I dwell in cities, though far away I roam,
Blue mountains in the distance will always whisper—"Home."

in could carry thirty head of cows. A t is he isn't able to care for more th six.

He lost his boys simply because he di 't use them right. I've often heard hi say, 'I'll be bound if I'll give the b any wages. Don't I clothe and ke them?' But they had other ideas ar followed them as soon as they ca e of age.

As I sat there listening to Wykoff co plaining, I couldn't help recalling h wise and sensible Hiram had been to ay his young laborers. He'll keep th with him in his old age.

Wykoff in the end has had to pay w es, but his laborers now are inexpe enced foreign help.

Hiram had paid early. He made his h partners in the grand enterprise. Wykoff was paying, now, but too late. His boys had been lost to farming."

THAT night as I walked home from my gray-haired friend's house, I kept thinking over this problem.

It seemed to me to be a case of arousing the boy's interest. Or to put it simply, it seemed to be a case of wages. Who shall get them! Our boys or strangers?

But you and I want our own boys. They are human. Let us resolve to use them right. In return they will use us right.

Think how fine it will be to have your own boys as partners, and bright and intelligent partners, in this grand work of farming.

Think of the days to come. How fine it will be to have your own boys settled not many miles from you on prosperous farms! Think what it will mean, even if you have only one boy, to have him as a co-partner in your work. His eager youth and ambitions will fire you with enthusiasm and prod your maturer judgment to progressive action.

And to those who have no boys of their own, why not adopt one? There are many worthy ones.

But (and it is a big one) use the boys right. Begin today in some small way. Plant, and in turn you will reap a wonderful harvest. It will be a bumper crop of helpfulness, of love, of comradeship, of inspiration.

Few boys will disappoint us if we will only use them right. So why not?

Our Relief Work in Poland

A REMARKABLE letter has been received this week from Pastor r Lousen of Wyszgrod, Poland, repo ing the progress of the Christian H ld Relief work among the war wi ws and orphans. The region is one wh h has been frightfully devastated by the war and conditions are desc ed as they existed on April 16 of th year Pastor Lousen writes:

T e upper picture looks like a fa y picnic pa y starting of r the day—un you glance at hat they w d have to re n to just b ow. Must fe ood to such pe le to learn th strangers in fa ff America a willing to h them In th extremity.

"ALL the Evangelicals have experienced for a shorter or longer pe od expulsion from homes and lands a other temporal possessions. The e ulsion has presented harrowing sc es. No consideration was shown to ei er the sick or those with child. The o r simply read: 'Begone!' Some di in the deepest misery while on the w to Warsaw; others died in Warsaw it f. During the turmoil brothers and si rs became separated from each o r, wives from their husbands, pare from their small children, and to t day they have not seen each other a n. Think of the sufferings endured b he little ones until their eyes closed in eath, either in the road-ditch or in t open field! On the slightest charge, m were cast into prison as spies.

Whoever succeeded, through wand ng about in the forests or through fl t in a boat across the Vistula, in esc ing to the Germans, or in gaining d verance through the unexpectedly q k fall of Warsaw, enjoyed being a in in his own homestead; but alas, in hat condition! As a rule he beheld b re him nothing but a heap of ruins a ashes. Where fire had not wrought d ruction, all that was not nailed and ri ted had been pilfered and carried a y. One farmer had the rare fortune t ind three of his horses, and was permitted to take them away. But cases in which one has the luck of recovering his possessions are exceptional. Here, too, the rule is that 'Gone is gone, lost is lost.' Hence the distress of the returned is great.

"In the village of Mischery, six families, or rather wrecks of families, have returned. Theirs was the good fortune to find several houses of relatives and acquaintances still standing; but no one has a horse, a cow, or any agricultural implements. With empty hands they must begin all over. In Wladislawowo, the village president, Zittlau, lost all his children but one daughter. Several died of typhus; others were carried away. On the other hand, he found and took under his protection two of the children of relatives. In a little house in Cieskowo, I found a woman ninety or one hundred years old, a female relative of about forty, apparently dumb, and a blind man of forty-three years. When I told them that the Germans had sent them a pastor and the Americans' money, the blind man, moved by joy and gratitude, broke forth into a song of praise of many stanzas which he had learned from his mother. Just now I received word of the remnants of four families in direst need. They have lost two harvests, all of their live stock and their implements. They were able to get two horses (one of which died), two cows, and nine chickens.

"Compared with the Evangelicals, the Catholics suffer one disadvantage. Because of the larger number of the expelled Evangelicals, the home of some Evangelical can more readily be secured for those who remain. The Catholics, however, not being expelled because of their being Polish, have great difficulty in finding a domicile when their own homes have been destroyed by fire. Where empty houses of Evangelicals have been found, the Poles have occupied them. But the one disadvantage referred to, arising from the dearth of homes, is offset by certain great advantages enjoyed by the Catholics. Permitted to stay with their belongings, they have been able to keep them together. Besides, the finding of all kinds of live stock and other property has cut a great figure; so that the Catholics have plenty.

"Only a few Jews are found in the country. To these we have, in case of real need, given assistance. In Wyszgrod itself sixty per cent. are Jews.

"The need is great, very great. Aid rendered just at this time secures for the distressed multitudes some prospects of a harvest, because it will enable them to cultivate a portion of the land. Within a few days my funds will be exhausted. I pray with all urgency that another remittance may come quickly."

In Galicia alone 1,500,000 of the civilian population have perished from starvation. Throughout Poland, 200 towns and 20,000 villages have been destroyed—leveled to the ground; 1,600 churches are in ruins. Losses to agricultural, commercial and industrial interests exceed $11,000,000,000. Altogether 14,000,000 of a population of 34,000,000 Poles are dead of battle, starvation and diseases of the war. The same armies have swept over the country again and again, in alternate triumph and defeat. In many places even the forests, which were the kindly hiding-places of thousands of refugees, have been obliterated.

READERS wishing to have a part in easing the awful misery in Poland and throughout the devastated regions of war-maddened Europe will please address the Widows and Orphans Relief Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

Deaf Children at Mont-Lawn

PRINCIPAL Carrie W. Kearns of the School for the Deaf in Manhattan, writes: "I have just heard, through Miss Gilmartin, of the splendid time my deaf children had at the Christian Herald Children's Home this year, and I want to thank you, oh, so much, for all your kindness. It means so much to these little ones and to their parents. They talk about it all through the year. Indeed, early last February two of my little lads came to me one day and said, 'We want to go to the country. We tell you now.' So please accept our sincere thanks. I hope you have had a good summer, despite the dreadful epidemic among the children in the cities, which fills us all with sorrow. I hope we shall soon hear that it is over." There has not been a single case of the epidemic among our Mont-Lawn little folks. All through the years since it was founded, it has been free from any visitation of sickness and there has never been a death among the children, although many thousands have visited the place as guests of the Home. The management is profoundly grateful for God's goodness and for the protecting care with which he has surrounded these little ones.

Her Aids to Better Cooking

EVERY woman who takes pride in her cooking will find that Crisco helps make foods tasteful, appetizing, wholesome and easy to digest.

Crisco is the ideal food fat, wholly vegetable, tasteless and odorless and so delicate that foods in which it is used are unusually dainty.

CRISCO
For Frying - For Shortening For Cake Making

The Crisco Library is dedicated to the woman who cares. Three books are published—each having its own distinctive value and all worthy of place among useful volumes of household reference.

Janet McKenzie Hill's new book "The Whys of Cooking" deals with many of the problems that perplex the housewife. No doubt some of your own are among the many questions asked and answered by this Boston Cooking School expert who is editor of "American Cookery". Many new recipes.

"Balanced Daily Diet" also by Janet McKenzie Hill, describes a simple and new system of meal planning which enables us to include the proper food elements in our meals. It should be in the hands of everyone interested in the proper building of mental and physical strength.

A "Calendar of Dinners" contains a menu for every day in the year and 615 tested recipes. It is the work of the well known cooking authority, Marion Harris Neil. Cloth-bound and gold-stamped.

Each book contains the interesting Story of Crisco. The first two are illustrated in color Any one of the three makes a beautiful and useful gift. For your convenience we suggest that you fill out and mail this coupon.

The Sign of Paint Success

Realize Your Ideal of a Beautiful Home

You and your family will spend three-fourths of your time in your home this winter. You will receive your friends there frequently. Surely it is worth while to give serious thought to decorating your constant surroundings.

Artistically decorated rooms, like good music and good books, are elevating and refining. Furthermore, a change in decorations now and then makes home more attractive to everybody and is a source of pride to the hostess.

A tastefully decorated home does not imply great expense. The numerous surfaces that are constantly becoming worn you can easily do over yourself; larger surfaces can be refinished by the painter —all with

A Prisoner in the Castle

International Sunday School Lesson for September 17. Acts 22

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge and my fortress; my God, in whom I trust.
Ps. 91 : 2

This is the humble boast of some holy unknown saint, to which the whole psalm is the answer, first by a choir of friendly voices, and finally by God Himself. Dare to say this thing of God, even when your foot is slipping, or the foe is creeping up the pass. Cellini said it, when lying a prisoner in the Castle of St. Angelo and daily expecting execution, from which finally he was released through the intervention of Francis the First. And Savonarola, on the last night of his life, pillowed his head on it, and as the morning light struggled through the bars of his prison a watcher saw a smile play over his face, soft and gentle as the smile of a little child, and with the strength these words gave him he met his death with unflinching courage. Ruskin learned to say it be e his mother's knee. Beza relates t in his younger years, he was one da i the church at Charenton and heard s psalm expounded. It came home to h with power, and he was enabled to c e with the verse that heads this paragra . Through his life, which was a sto y one, he was kept in perfect peace, and n his deathbed he said to his asseml l friends: "Now I have no more to wait r but the fulfilling of those last words of e psalm, 'I will show him my salvati ' which with confidence I look for." W y should you not take this as your life-w ? Let your life be hidden with Christ in G as your encircling fortress from the foe. i high refuge above the overflowing floo

Paul Vindicates His Gentile Mission

By George D. Allison, D. D., Ph. D.

STANDING on the castle stairs, surrounded by Roman soldiers, Paul speaks as a Jew to Jews, endeavoring to prove to them the divine urgency that had sent him far out beyond the borders of Israel. The Hebrew tongue caught their attention; the Hebrew synagogue salutation of "Brothers, men and fathers" held it fast; the account of his Pharisaic training and zeal for orthodoxy made them anxious to know what had changed him so completely. What a master of situations was the apostle! In a few ready words he puts before them, without interruption, an account of his experience on the Damascus road, when the voice of Christ resounded through his soul.

We do well to remind ourselves again and again that there is such a thing in human experience as conversion—real, genuine, remarkable. All history is different because of the complete right-about-face of Paul's soul. He literally "changed his mind" about Christ, about Christians, about the supreme issues of his life. And Paul was neither the first nor the last to do such a thing. In every age the persecutor has become the confessor. Levi the publican, selling out his standing in the community of Israel for Roman gold; despised, vindictive, greedy; has become Matthew the saint, treasuring up instead of shekels the words of Jesus; becoming rich in beatitudes, using his pen for the glory of God instead of for tax-accounts. Twenty centuries later John B. Gough turns from poverty and delirium of drink to become the great evangelist of the temperance reform.

Present-day instances are numerous too. Every Christian teacher should read and know Harold Begbie's great book of experimental religion, "Twice-born Men." This tells of men such as most of us have known and despaired of, who proved to be within the reach of divine grace. We give people up too easily. Pastors and leaders alike say of such a one, "Nothing can be done with him." But who shall limit the power of God? Not long ago I was driving in the country with a minister friend when we passed a farm where I had spent a pleasant hour the day before. "Are they members of your flock?" I asked. "Not they," said he, "they are lost sheep. No use trying to win them." No effort had ever been made to bring this delightful family into the church. They were accounted lost without being sought in Jesus' name. But should we not mean by "lost" what Jesus did—"not found yet"? Do you know of people like this within reach of your church?

MANY people well educated and respected need Paul's sort of conversion. For, mark you, he was not a bad man but a mistaken one. So countless good people today need to realize that "this way" is right, that the church is worth their efforts, that Christ has need of them. They may not be active persecutors as he, but are nevertheless passive discouragers of Christ's kingdom on earth. And more personal still, conversion means to you and to me that there is not a fault nor hindrance in your soul or in mine that cannot be healed by the Great Physician. If we surrender completely, and with strong crying and tears implore God's mercy, we too shall be cleansed, "straightened out," and made useful to the Highest.

What a turmoil of mind must Paul have been in as he journeyed to Damascus! He remembered Stephen's face "as it had been the face of an angel." Other beautiful Christians puzzled and distressed his heart. Yet it could not be that the Galilean Carpenter, dishonored, crucified, was nevertheless the long-awaited Messiah of the Jews and Redeemer of the world. Yet wonderful things he had said and done. And there was something unaccountable about his followers that they had gained from him. What a study for the Christian psychologist is the mind of Paul, as he fell under the noon-day Syrian sun and heard a voice saying, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" If there were more people with consciences as sensitive as his, there would be more visions and more imperative calls into Christian service. When the instinctive cry of a man's nature is, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" there is no doubt of the final outcome of his career.

When Paul reached Jerusalem after his conversion he naturally expected to be useful among his fellow countrymen. So he tells in all honesty of his surprise as he realized that God wished him to go to the Gentiles. He wrestled with the angel of guidance. He argued with his Lord. He was a Hebrew of the Hebrews. He would like to counteract the harm he had done the Jerusalem church. He especially wished to atone for his share in the martyrdom of Stephen by witnessing the same faith in Stephen's stead. But God, speaking insistently within his soul, said, "Depart, for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles." His Christian experience, step by step, reinforced the voice of the Holy Spirit.

HOW true it is that we do not choose our own fields of service! Carey would go to Africa, but was appointed to India. Judson would serve India, but was made the apostle to Burma. Stranger still, many an eager volunteer for foreign service has had his way marked clearly out in the home field. The girl who longed for a great career is given a little village home and four or five little children for her portion. The quiet scholar and teacher discovers a new principle of religious education and finds the world his forum. How often we need to be reminded that we are in the Master's power, to go according to his direction, to do after his bidding! It is not where you worked but how that counts, not even how much accomplished but how much attempted; not what you did achieve but with what spirit did you labor at the Lord's command and with what readiness give up all at his word.

Though singularly fitted to preach Christ to the Jews, Paul was yet more remarkably prepared by the providence of God for the Gentile mission. It was essential that the new departure should be conducted by one in thorough sympathy with the old basis. The New Testament Greek world needed the Old Testament Hebrew ideals. In Paul the foundations of the prophets were conserved; the intense ethical and moral passion of Israel carried over into the less scrupulous West; and the uncompromising monotheism of Judea went out among the idolatries of Greece and Rome. He was more than a Jew. "A Roman born," a citizen of no ean city, a natural cosmopolitan, h was familiar with the works of Gree and Cretan poets and could meet o heir own ground cultured Athenian p osophers, proconsuls like Sergius ulus and barbarians like those he e ountered in Lycaonia and on the isl d of Malta. He was a man, and "tal him for all and all" the world has not oked on his like again.

PAUL lost his hold on the mol hen he reached the account of th Gentile mission. What a strange t g is pride of race, and stranger still, re ious fanaticism! The one we saw wh this hideous European War was br king out two years ago and thousa s of people thronged the streets of th arious capitals cheering their ow flag and reviling the neighbor nations. And only a few years ago we had in the oxer uprising scenes of religious and na nalistic frenzy like that described ere, when the Christian nurses, teach and physicians who sought only to erve and to save were put to tortu and death by furious mobs. Not n a common Christianity has change this spirit in the modern world. A eper and more thoughtful interpretat n of Christ than the churches of Europ ave given the people is needed still. Race exclusiveness marks our own a tude toward the Mexican situatio and hinders a just and Christlike ap eciation of our opportunities and re onsibilities to the neighbor under the G spel. Indeed, many Christians do not s port the modern missionary propa nda, which is the present-day count part of Paul's efforts. Some of them pfess allegiance to the old Judaizing sect, it would seem, and disapprove of ul's venture beyond Samaria.

Mob violence is a poor ansv to reason and righteousness. The owd could not disprove a thing that Pa had said. Quite characteristically, they threw dust in the air." That l always been the favorite expedi of those whose case is weak in itics as well as in religion. The infid lecturer throws plenty of dust, cor sing the fundamental issues of fait and unbelief.

The chief captain was deceiv by the uproar. Something must b very much amiss with Paul. He ha him dragged to the shelter of the Cast and bids the soldiers scourge him to get the truth. But Paul gives us a les n in common sense here. He will ha no unnecessary martyrdoms. "Do you scourge Roman citizens nowa s?" is the purport of his remark to th centurion. The result is instant. The captain himself comes to see the p oner and finds his claim true. He was ared for more fairly after that, you m be sure.

It is not right to submit mee to monstrous injustice. The Ch tian worker should have a due sense the dignity of his cause and of him an ambassador of the King of kings. He should use every weapon and every advantage of standing, education and influence to make himself a hearing on behalf of Christ. A tame and timorous spirit was no part of Paul's conception of the Christian life. Many a consecrated successor of his has not maintained his dignity and his wisdom. To be respected by the highest does not interfere one whit with one's usefulness to the lowliest.

Paul remained in chains but not dishonored. He felt that he shared then in the sufferings of Christ and was cheered as he realized that he should also partake of the glory that shall be. It is a great and hallowing experience to suffer for Jesus Christ. No wonder that in times of persecution the light of the spirit has burned brightest. The greatest saints have known the discipline of the dungeon itself. What have you ever suffered "for conscience sake?"

Young People's Topics for September 17

Little Chances to Help

Christian Endeavor, Ex. 17 : 8-13

IN every town and village of our broad land there are present-day Aarons and Hurs who are upholding the hands of those who are doing the work of the Kingdom. The uplifted hands of Moses stood to the armies of Israel for the power of God, but the physical weakness of Moses made him alone unequal to the task. Aaron and Hur therefore shared with Moses the joy of bringing salvation to Israel. There are many ways to help. Some of us fail because we do not see; let us pray for keener vision. Some of us lose our opportunities for service because we are too intent upon our own concerns. We need to seek a measure of consecrated unselfishness. Others of us see the chance to help; we would like to rush to the help of the Lord; but we are too easy-going, and before we get ready to help the opportunity is gone, the wearied hands have finished the task, or it is forever undone. We need a spiritual self-starter. There was once a band of young people who agreed that each of them would each day do at least one deed of mercy or helpfulness which they thought would be difficult; but they found, when they began to look about them, that chances for helpfulness were unlimited. Instead of being hard to find one opportunity a day, it was seldom that any of them found but one.

Young People's Rally Day

B. Y. P. U.

WHEN soldiers rally they rally around their leaders. When young people rally, they rally the same way. They must have something to rally about. They can't rally about an idea unless some one has made it living ideal. The whole success of any Rally Day lies in the leadership, in the officers and in the records of their leadership. Human folks only rally about things regarding which they can get intensely enthusiastic; and they won't get enthusiastic about leadership that is cold, or critical, or undiscoverable. Get your officers aroused and tremendously in earnest, and your Rally Day will be a big success. Programs and material for Rally Day may be secured by writing to 1701 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

League Study Courses

Epworth League, II Tim 4 : 13; Neh. 8 : 1-3, 8

THE efficient workers in every business or profession are those who know the most about the work in which they are engaged. The men who have gone ahead are the men who have been at home with a book, men who have studied their jobs and the jobs of the men above them. The same thing is true in church work. The best workers, the ones whose enthusiasms do not run out, the ones but for whom the church would cease to be a movement and would become but a monument, are those who know their Bible, who are informed about the world-wide work of the church and who have gained the world vision of the Kingdom. In young people's work leaders and workers change rapidly; each generation of workers must provide for its successors or the work will languish. There is no better way, almost no other way, to insure succession in leadership than the way that lies through Bible and mission study classes. The League that is alive and that will be alive next year and the year after is the one that pushes the study classes, and that presses every member to join and to attend. Full information regarding courses and books can be secured from any office of the Book Concern or from the Central Office of the Epworth League, 740 Rush Street, Chicago.

The Bible Picture Contest

EVER since the closing of the Bible Picture Contest a large force of assistants has been at work putting the answers in form for submission to the judges. This has proven a monumental task. Each set of answers received has been numbered and each verse submitted for each picture has been properly listed. As many as 200 verses have been submitted for some of the pictures. The lists are now nearly complete and will be printed and submitted to the judges within a very short time.

It will take some time to go through the thousands of sets of answers to credit the correct answers as carefully as this must be done, and we cannot now say just when we shall be able to announce the winners of the contest. But as the work proceeds, its progress will be noted in the Christian Herald and any information that is available will thus be given to all the readers of the Herald, including contestants.

We know that it seems long, but to do it quickly would mean to do it carelessly, and above all we are determined upon absolute fairness to every contestant. This means time, and we can only ask those interested to continue to be patient.

Among the Workers

WITH the October number, the Missionary Review of the World passes into the hands of the new Missionary Review Publishing Company, of which Dr. Robert E. Speer is president, and Mr. Frank L. Brown vice-president. The offices will be at 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City. The Review was founded in 1878 by Rev. yal G. Wilder, formerly a missionary in India. Ten years later the magazine came under the joint editorship of Dr. thur T. Pierson and Dr. James M. erwood. On the death of the latter in 1890, Dr. Pierson became editor-in-chief and so continued until his death twenty-one years later. The editorial management will continue in the hands of Mr. Delavan L. Pierson, who has been connected with the magazine for twenty-five years and has been the editor-in-chief since the death of his father, Dr. A. T. Pierson, in 1911.

THE Northfield Summer School for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies has just completed the most successful session in the history of the movement. Last year's attendance record of 921 was surpassed with a registration of 1,268. The attendance by denominations was as follows: Baptist, 372; Congregational, 293; Dutch Reformed, 98; Episcopal, 24, Friends, 7; Lutheran, 16; Methodist, 191; Presbyterian, 193; Reformed Presbyterian, 3; United Presbyterian, 8; Universalist, 60; Unitarian, 1; Christian, 3; Evangelical Association, 1; United Evangelical, 1; Roman Catholic, 2.

IN the first six months under prohibition, Seattle, Wash., according to the Seattle Times, which opposed the prohibition law, made gains as follows, there being a falling off in only one item, building permits, which dropped $174,000: Bank clearings increased more than $55,000,000; bank deposits in general and savings deposits in particular increased. Real estate transfers increased in number and prices advanced. Collections improved nearly fifty per cent. Total arrests for all causes in the first six months of 1915 were 11,288; in 1916, 5,444. The Times now admits that it was wrong in predicting disaster as a result of prohibition.

MISS KATHERINE PETTIT of the Pine Mountain Settlement School writes to the Christian Herald: "During the long Sunday afternoons, when it is more than a day's task to keep our family of little folks busy and interested, we shall remember you with the utmost gratitude for these pictures which you have sent us. We are glad our children can have them for the youngsters appreciate the pictures and can't be dragged away from them to play with anything else."

GOODYEAR Cord Tires were once considered the special prerogative of the larger and costlier cars.

But now a tremendous demand has sprung up among owners of cars of every size, and almost every class.

For these motorists also are keen for the longer gas mileage, the power-saving and the freedom from stone-bruise which are assured by Goodyear Cord Tires.

And they do not let a slightly higher price stand in the way of getting such advantages and economies.

The Inland Sea of the Yukon

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I AM on the Yukon River, steaming slowly through the wilds of Alaska. This mighty stream has its source a thousand miles southeast of where I am writing. It rises in the headwaters of the Lewes and the Pelly, within a short walk of the Pacific Ocean, and it flows from here perhaps 1,300 miles more before it pours out over the wide flats of the tundra into Bering Sea. In this region the stream is enormous. It is from ten to twenty miles wide, and the channel winds sluggishly in and out among islands of all shapes and sizes. The waters are like glass, putty-colored during the daytime, and with all the hues of the rainbow as the sun rises and sets. Just now it is about midnight, when the Yukon becomes one sheet of molten gold, or of the hue of flowing copper as the metal pours forth from the furnace.

Everywhere you look you see the Yukon at its work of earth-building. Its waters are melting the prehistoric ice that begins two or three feet under the moss and muck covering; and great blankets of earth, studded with trees, fall down into the river. Sandbars rise in a season, and islands are created with the floods of one spring. Other islands are swept away. There are no rocks anywhere. The bed of the river is silt, and the silt goes down to great depths. There are so many channels among the islands that a man without a compass and sailing directions would surely get lost. Indeed, in the early days the cheechakos, or tenderfeet, coming here to get gold, were facetiously warned to beware of the Yukon flats, as they might wander into channels that would lead them into the Arctic Ocean instead of the main course of the river.

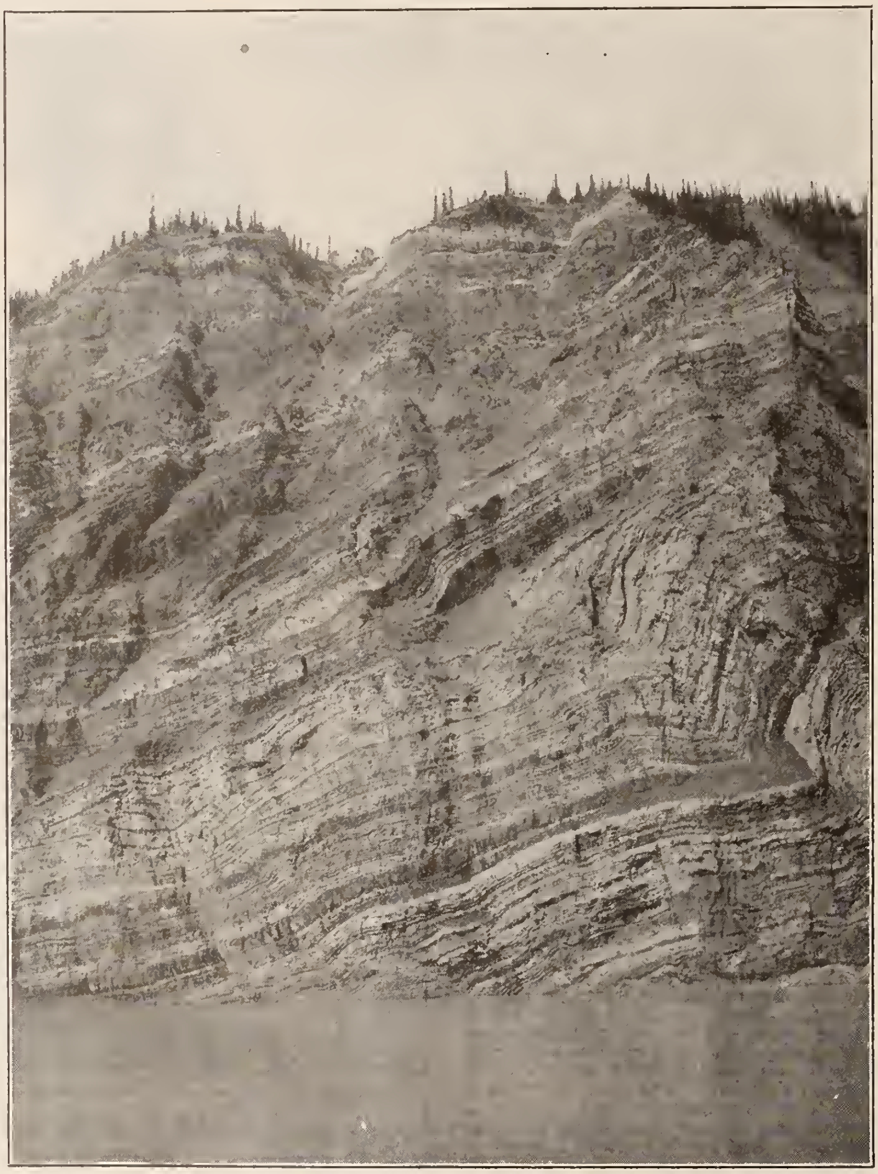
The channels are really uncharted and practically unsurveyed, and the steamers have difficulty in making their way. In the trip preceding the one I am making, the Alaska, supposed to be the best ship on the river, struck a newly made sandbar below Circle City, and it was five days before she was again on her way.

Our steamer has spars at the side which can be dropped into the sand in such a way that the engine can pry itself off when so grounded. The Alaska was similarly equipped, but the spars broke and hence the delay. In her case the governor of the territory was aboard, and he narrowly escaped missing the steamer at St. Michael, which would have delayed him a month in getting back to his home at Juneau, the capital.

The river is wonderfully quiet. You may sail a hundred or more miles without seeing a town or any sign of habitation. Indeed, it is said that outside Fort Yukon there are only three men living at intervals of forty or fifty miles apart on the whole course of the river. These men are woodchoppers and hunters. They sell wood to the steamers. The captain asked one of them the other day the price of his wood. The man replied: "Dave Drollette has been telling around the neighborhood that I have been selling wood at $5 a cord, but it ain't so." The humor of this lies in the word "neighborhood." The man's nearest neighbor is forty miles off and Dave Drollette lives 100 miles up the river.

This absence of man makes the wilderness impressive. The mighty stream and the great dome of the sky in which the clouds hang low, but are apparently stationary, cause one to feel that he is but an atom in God's mighty world. For the most of the time the only living things visible are those on our boat, and the only noises are the splashing of the paddle-wheel at the stern, the voices of the humans on deck, and the howls of the dogs we are carrying to the roadhouses down stream.

THE day will soon come when the Yukon will be one of the tourist routes of the world. A company is now being organized to put up great hotels at Skagway, Dawson, Seward and Fairbanks, and to turn our European travel to this part of the world. As soon as the government railway is completed, Alaskan travelers will come from Puget Sound, a thousand miles northward, through scenery more wonderful than that of Norway, and be carried on the White Pass Railway over the Coast Range of mountains. They will be taken down the Yukon, past the Klondike gold region, and into the Arctic Circle, where they can see the sun shine at midnight. From there they will go on down the Yukon to the mouth of the Tanana and up that river to Fairbanks to connect with Uncle Sam's road, and go across country to Seward. On the way they will pass through this great inland sea known as the flats, they will visit the wildest parts of the interior of Alaska, and make side trips to Mount McKinley, the highest peak on our continent. The course of the Yukon from White Horse to Dawson is as picturesque as any part of the Rhine or the Danube, and the whole of the journey will have all of the wildness of a virgin country which until now has been untouched by man.



Calico Bluff, which looks like a moss agate

In coming down the Upper Yukon you steam by mountains that rise to the clouds, you pass by rocks that look like castles and wind your way among hills blanketed with pink flowers that remind you of the heather-clad hills of old Scotland. Just inside the international boundary I saw two rocks facing one another on opposite sides of the river. They were of gigantic proportions, parts of the mighty cliffs that rise up from the stream. The formations were such that one had the almost perfect face of a man, whereas the profile of the other was of a woman. The rocks are known as "The Old Man" and "The Old Woman."

A little farther down stream is a place where the Yukon cuts its way through cliffs that rise like a mighty wall, almost straight up from the water to a height greater than that of the Washington Monument. The cliffs are formed of strata of a dozen different colors, white, gold, black, brown, green and red, and they rise and fall like the stripes of a waving flag. They are of different widths, and as you steam under the bluff they show a roughness that makes them seem to have been gnawed out by the snaggy teeth of Old Father Time. In Europe this formation would have some romantic title. Here it is called "The Calico Bluff." As we went by it in the steamer one of the passengers who had a revolver amused himself by sending shots into the strata, declaring in advance just which colored ribbon he expected to hit.

Leaving the bluffs, we struck a patch of green forest and frightened two moose that had come to the river to drink. We saw a lynx swimming the river and a mile farther on passed a fishing wheel which, turned by the current, was scooping up pink salmon and throwing them into a wooden box at the end. Behind the wheel on the shore were the tents of the Indians, who were thus laying in their food for the winter.

I took this steamer at Dawson, and about nine hours later we crossed the international boundary between Canada and Alaska, and were in United States territory. The boundary line is so marked that it can be easily seen. It is a wide strip cut through the woods up hill and down dale, from north to south from where our line ends near the Pacific Ocean to the Arctic Ocean. It starts within thirty miles of the Pacific and goes straight toward the North pole for a distance of 875 miles. It is the longest continuous straight boundary line ever surveyed.

CROSSING the boundary into Alaska the first settlement is an Indian village above which on a pole erected beside a log church floats the American flag. Near by may be seen the black mast of the wireless station, the first outpost of the Signal Corps of our army, whose telegraph system covers the greater part of the territory; and still farther on is Eagle, the first American town on the Yukon. Eagle prides itself on its Americanism. It has a poem, celebrating the advantages of Alaska over Canada. I give you a part of one verse:

You may here forget there are crowns and kings,
Ladies-in-waiting and such like things;
For now you are under the Eagle's wings.

As it was, we could see the American flags of Eagle, even before we caught sight of the houses. Every cabin has a tall flagstaff attached to its roof, and from the Yukon I counted a dozen American flags floating in the breeze. They were probably put up to welcome the steamer from Canada.

The Eagle of today is a has-been. It is like the deserted mining camps of the West which were abandoned when the gold had played out. It was once known as Eagle City. It had hundreds of inhabitants and all the wild life that came from the successful gold diggings near by. It still has about 100 one-story log cabins, but half of them are deserted and some are falling to ruins. It has a two-story hotel, a two-story log customhouse and a trading station that belongs to the Northern Commercial Company. There is an Episcopal missionary working there.

Leaving Eagle, our next stop was at Circle, another half-deserted village living on the memories of its past. During my stay I called at the restaurant, and its owner, Fred Brentlinger, showed me a pair of arctic ox horns which he had dug from the prehistoric ice thirty feet under the ground. These horns measure three feet from tip to tip and are in good preservation. I asked him the price and he told me it was $500. This whole country has the remains of prehistoric animals locked up in vaults of perpetual ice. In the Klondike they have dug up the bones of mastodons and other giant animals of the past; and nearly every town has a great ivory tusk or skeleton of an animal that lived in Alaska before the ice age began.

Brentlinger, the man who owns the arctic ox horns, has two cub bears, each of which lives in a ten-gallon keg back of the restaurant. They are as black as ink and as lively as kittens. He has named them Teddy and Nigger.

Every one in Alaska has heard of [illegible] Cadzo. He is one of the biggest trappers of the far north. Cadzo is content to live almost all alone in the wilds. His home is 200 miles from the nearest white settlement. It is about 150 miles south of the Arctic Ocean, a little farther from Fort McPherson on a branch of the Mackenzie, and 225 miles from Fort Yukon. Nevertheless, he likes it.

I asked him to tell me about his home in the wilderness. He replied:

"It is about sixteen by forty, with wings at the side. It is made of logs and lined with the best beaver board. We have double windows, and our wood stoves keep us hot as toast notwithstanding the thermometer sometimes goes down to seventy degrees below zero. I have one of the best cellars of the far north. . . . There are not a half dozen white men in the whole country. We are so far away that we did not know there was a war in 1914 until we came out with our furs in 1915. You see, our nearest mail station is here at Fort Yukon and we have to go 450 miles to call at the post office."

World-Wide Organization to Combat a World-Wide Foe

By HERVEY WOOD

THE readers of the Christian Herald together with Christians the world over will be ised to learn that there has been fned in New York City an organiza- t destined to do untold good for ny years to come. This organization o be known as the "Native Races ti-Liquor Traffic Committee." It is posed of representatives of the lead- missionary organizations of the ited States and Canada, and of minent Christian business men of evangelical denominations. It is etly non-sectarian and non-partisan. The object in view is to prevent the noralization and destruction of the ive races by the liquor traffic, and make our foreign missionary work re effective.

The methods of operation are: (1) To sure national and international legis- ion, with the object of stopping the ding of liquor into any part of ristian missionary fields. (2) The paration and circulation of liter- ire, to be used in home churches, aling with the effects of this liquor ffic in missionary fields. (3) The paration of temperance literature to supplied free to missionaries on the eign fields, for circulation among the tive races.

Almost from the commencement of dern missions complaints have come m missionaries of the havoc being ought by intoxicating liquors among natives. Native chiefs have gone er to Europe pleading with European vernments to stop shipping liquor to eir countries. These things led the ristian churches of Europe in May, 87, to organize the "Native Races quor Traffic United Committee," th headquarters in London. At the eaking out of the present European ar, the following countries were in the ganization: Great Britain, Germany, ance, Switzerland, Holland, Den- ark, Belgium, Italy and Spain.

Strange to say, the greatest mission- y countries in the world, viz., the nited States and Canada, were not in e organization, though many attempts re made by friends in Europe to ve such an organization formed in merica.

When the Ecumenical Council of For- gn Missions was held in Carnegie all in New York City in May, 1900, o delegates, in the persons of the ev. John G. Patton, D.D., fifty years missionary in the New Hebrides Isl- ds, and Dr. C. F. Harford, of London, ere sent over at an expense of nearly ,000 to try to induce American mis- onary societies and churches to form organization such as they had in urope. Sad to say, no organization as found here to cooperate with those Europe, and the liquor traffic has one on shipping what Rev. Lyman eecher called "liquid damnation."

In order that readers may see how the -called heathen African regard Ameri- ns, I enclose three letters received nce the first of May last, from the nited Committee of the European ganization. Here they are:

No. 1.

HERE is an important and sad fact which I hope you will make use of at once in ur religious press.

A missionary from the Gold Coast, just turned, has been to see me this morning. e says that in August, 1915, a yam festival as held in a village near his station, where e people were supplied with large quantities f American rum. The result was a fearful gy of drunkenness and a riot in which over irty persons were killed. The government ficials had to close down the liquor shops for time in order to restore peace and order to is African village.

This is what Boston rum means when it aches West Africa.

No 2.

YOUR letter of the 12th inst. with enclosure, is just to hand. I reply at once, s I have found a good quotation from your opaganda work. It is from a book by an merican, viz. "Pioneering in Central frica," by S. P. Verner.

"The Roquelle was loaded to its utmost capacity with the usual cargoes for the African trade. A heavy charge of rum was a conspicuous item. This came principally from Boston, whose rum and religion constitute a puzzle which Africans and philanthropists have tried in vain to solve. When I was introduced to the black Ashantis they were informed that I was an American. 'Ah, Melican man, eh?' said the chief. 'Melican lum plenty good: you got Melican lum?' This was all he knew of America. I could not elicit anything more about my country from him than this testimony to the far-reaching influence of New England culture."

No. 3.

HERE is another bit of evidence as to the effects of Boston rum on the Gold Coast, West Africa.

Rev. A. Jehle, Basel Mission, Akropong, Gold Coast, West Africa, under date of May 27, 1916, says:

"I have heard a most shocking case from Kibbi (Eastern Akim). At a funeral the largest brass basin was placed on the street and constantly emptied and filled with the vile stuff. Several small children who had been made to drink died during the night."

The chiefs of this district of Eastern Akim seeing the danger rum is doing to their people, have presented a memorial to the governor of the Gold Coast, asking for it to be kept out of their area altogether.

At present the only answer he has given them is that they must prosecute those who give way to drink.

We are informed that the rum traders on the coast are very powerful, and can exercise a good deal of influence on the government.

THE reading of these appalling facts ought to bring the blush of shame to every American cheek. Alas, alas! America is not the only country that is sending liquor to Africa, nor is Africa the only country into which liquor is being sent. India and China and Japan, and also South American countries, are being deluged. Dr. E. H. Hart, a medical missionary from Central China, made this statement recently: "Agents of the breweries and distilleries were giving away samples of their goods to cultivate the habit, which will create an open market for the liquor trade." Another returned missionary who was present confirmed this. The Archdeacon of Bombay is reported to have said recently, "England found India sober; when she leaves she will leave India drunk." He continued, "To every man that we have made a Christian, we have made one hundred drunkards." This Native Races Anti-Liquor Traffic Committee proposes to put a stop to this debauching of the peoples to whom our missionaries have gone. It is a lamentable fact that the only drunken nations are the so-called Christian nations.

Buddhists and Mohammedans are total abstainers; so are Confucians. Your missionaries are taunted by the "unspeakable Turk" with "Christian dogs are saloonkeepers and drunkard-makers. Only Christians run saloons. Is this your Jesus way?" If a Mohammedan is seen drunk they say he has left Mohammed and joined Jesus.

Any persons desiring further information concerning the work of the Native Races Anti-Liquor Traffic Committee, or who would like to be identified with it or contribute money, can communicate with the Christian Herald.

THE Pacific Garden Mission of Chicago experienced a great loss in the death of Harry Monroe on July 31. For thirty-five years he had been connected with the Pacific Garden Mission and for twenty years had been its superintendent. The story of his conversion is a familiar one. "It was in February, 1880, I staggered past the mission and heard the singing. I had been wandering aimlessly, but came in. I heard men with whom I had drank tell their stories, and their testimonies rang true. George R. Clarke, the founder of the mission, came to me and said: 'Young man, do you know that Jesus loves you and so do I?' That appealed to me, so I said: 'Here goes. I quit the booze right now!' And I prayed the prayer, 'God be merciful to me a sinner, and save me for Jesus' sake,' and I never regretted it a moment since." He began his religious work immediately after his conversion among the class from which he had come.

Magazine Prices Going Up!

THE advance in cost of everything which goes to make up the magazine will compel us shortly to

INCREASE THE SUBSCRIPTION PRICE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD TO $2.00 A YEAR

The cost of white paper has more than doubled. Printing and illustrations have also advanced in price. We knew that the time must soon come for advancing the subscription price, but desired to postpone the increase as long as possible. To immediately advance the price without warning would be unjust to our readers.

For a limited time, therefore, we will give our subscribers an opportunity of renewing for another year at the present price of $1.50.

Subscriptions extending beyond 1917 cannot be accepted at these prices.

Many other magazines will also advance in price soon, but we can still give our readers the benefit of the unusual savings noted in the list below. Don't delay—order NOW. We may be compelled to withdraw these combinations at any time. The prices given are for one year, new or renewal, and can go to different addresses except in the few cases noted otherwise. Canadian and foreign postage additional.

The Wicked John Goode

THE Christian Herald has secured for serial publication a remarkable m u-script which gives the life history of a man who has been called the w st man in the world. Strangely enough, his name is John Goode. Tl is not fiction, for John Goode is now one of the leading figures of the Bowery Mis n. As a boy he was a thief, and successively a gangster, a grafter, a crook and a il-bird many times over. He even stole from his wife the pitifully small sums he earned scrubbing floors.

Some men are said to have a streak of yellow in them, but this man seeme to be yellow all through. And yet he was not, as it turned out when he entered he Bowery Mission and was caught by the imagery of Dr. Hallimond's words in pre hing the Gospel of regeneration. Though he fought against conversion, he gav in finally and accepted Christ.

He and his wife became reconciled. He made up, as far as he could in a w years of constant care and love, for the neglect which had formerly been her r-tion. And his grief when she died was pitiful to the last degree.

The story of John Goode, transcribed from his own words, by one who kı ws him well, is a plain, unvarnished tale which will take you into reformatory life, to the life of the open road, into jail life, and finally into the life which he now l ds as one of the respected members of the community. His regeneration is consid ed one of the miracles of the Bowery Mission. It is a moving story. It has been c ed a love story. Why? You will discover that when you read it.

This remarkable story will begin in an early issue of the Christian Herald.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE Bowery Mission is regarded as the public clearing-house for requests for prayer sent in to this department. At the end of each week a classified list is sent to the Mission, and at each of the eight public weekly services these prayers are submitted to the Throne of Grace. This is also done at the nightly Brotherhood meetings. A wonderful interest has been created, and no visitor to the Mission can fail to observe this characteristic of the institution. It is emphatically, and always, a House of Prayer.

The trustees of the Mission, therefore, have no hesitation in making a special appeal to the members of the Prayer League. It is that they will not fail, at least once a day, preferably at the precious noon hour, when so many spirits assemble with one accord at the Mercy Seat, to make earnest prayer that God will provide the necessary funds for the maintenance of the work during the coming year. Special, and very heavy, demands have suddenly arisen. The Fire Department of the city have, very properly, required extensive alterations, involving a large outlay. Owing to the vast number of other, and extra, demands upon the charitable public in connection with war relief, the regular contributions to the Mission have been for the last two years considerably affected. Meanwhile the requirements of the work itself go on increasing every year. Never was the work of rescuing lost souls more necessary or more effective.

Will every member of the League please remember this request?

THIS letter comes from Miss L. R. of Baton Rouge, La.: "All the members of our family had been brought to Christ save one, a boy. No words of repentance seemed to reach his heart. Mother and I concluded that we would go to God in secret prayer for him, and we prayed that God might change his mind and cause him to pray and be converted. In a few days our prayers were answered, and the angel of love brought peace to our home, and the last sinner was converted; and now we have a Christian home, wherein the love of God abides."

A Mother writes from La Salle, Ill.: "My boy has a position on trial at work he is not accustomed to. I ask the prayers of the Prayer League that he may be helped and guided to an understanding of his work. He is a Christian boy and is making an effort to do his best."

Anxious Mother writes from Georgia: "Some time ago I wrote and asked for prayer for my son, who was out of work, with a family, and was a victim of the dope habit. I now wish to acknowledge an answer to this prayer. He has been cured of this habit, and has had a position for two months. Please pray that he may secure a permanent position when this one expires. Please pray for my daughter's health to be restored."

Mrs. E. L. writes from Mont a: "Two weeks ago I sent you a req st that you pray for my brother who as drinking. Hardly had my letter rea ed you when I got a letter from him sa ng he had 'sworn off,' as they call it ut here. He says, 'No more for m .' Please pray that he may cont ue doing right. All praise to God, fo ve were powerless to save him. Girls Who Made Good

III. Practical Patty

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

"I HAVEN'T any talents," said Patty regretfully. "Mary paints such beautiful pictures, and Jean writes stories, and Gertrude plays and sings like—like an angel! But I can't do a single thing!"

Patty's little brother Bob looked up from his whittling. He was making a toy boat out of a stick of wood, and his small serious face was puckered into anxious lines. One can never tell whether a boat will be a success.

"Don't you care, Patty!" he exclaimed valiantly (for Bob thought that his sister was the best ever). "Don't you care. You can make the best chocolate cake!"

I remember how we all laughed at the funny little-boy compliment, and I remember how Patty let her hand rest gently on his shoulder for a moment (for she adored her small brother).

"Bless your heart, Bobby," she laughed. "You shall have a great big chocolate cake all for yourself."

And she whisked out of the room and left us envying Bob, for Patty did make the very best chocolate cake.

Patty was fifteen at the time, and in her first year at high school. We were far ahead of her in lessons, but not in anything else. For she kept the house spick and span for her invalid mother, darned Bobby's socks, and cooked the finest meals in town for her family and the two school teachers who boarded with her. "Practical Patty," I called her.

I have said before that Patty's mother was an invalid. Her father, an overworked and tired little man, died suddenly and left them with barely enough money to struggle along on, just after Bob was born. Patty was always sorry that Bob had been a tiny baby at the time.

"A father's so very necessary to a boy!" said Patty. "If he just had a memory!" And with this regret for Bob tucked down in her heart, she got to work.

The two school teachers were the first step in Patty's scheme of things. The money that the father had left was about to run pretty low before the school teachers became necessary. Patty saw early that extra funds were an absolute necessity. She was only twelve, but she kept the house clean, and the meals she served were even more than good. The school teachers were glad to come. After they came Patty was too busy to study. Perhaps that was why, at fifteen, she was a bit behind the others in school. One can't play trained nurse to an invalid, and father to a small boy, and maid to two very busy ladies, and still be a brilliant scholar.

"I can't keep up," she told us when we sympathized with her. "No, you mustn't be sorry for me. I don't mind. I like housework."

When Patty was seventeen her mother died. Patty, even during her deepest grief was not resentful. "I know she's happier—there," she said, "and I still have Bobby."

Bobby had grown into a big boy. He was getting tall fast, so fast that he needed constant relays of shoes and stockings; so fast that his sleeves insisted on shooting up, so that one always saw a red expanse of wrist. He didn't do any work, for Patty wanted him to go to school—to have his chance.

"If you had a father," she'd tell him, "he'd make you go." And then she would kiss him.

It was just at that time that the school board decided they had better move the school to the other end of the town and the two teachers who had boarded with Patty took regretful leave of her.

"You've been very good to us, dear," they said at parting, "and we wouldn't leave—only we must be near our work!"

"Of course, I understand," said Patty with a tired smile. You see, her income was bidding her goodby—with the teachers.

Troubles never come singly. The day the teachers left, Bob started off to school with his roller skates. He didn't come home at his usual time, and when supper was ready Patty began to worry. A growing boy is seldom late to supper. At twilight she was scared; at eight o'clock . . .

At eight o'clock steps sounded on the walk outside. Patty, opening the door, saw two men approaching. They carried Bob, a limp, strangely small-looking Bob, between them.

"He fell," they told her, "when he was skating. He fell under a truck. It ran over his legs. The doctor's comin'."

The doctor came. And, in time, he left; and then he returned with a surgeon, and there was a smell of ether and a tense quietness through all the house. When Bob came to himself he found Patty kneeling by his bedside.

"Am I hurt?" he moaned; and Patty, clasping his rough little hand in hers, smiled comfortingly. He was too weak to see the tears that lay just behind her smile. He did not know for many days that his right leg had been amputated, that his left—hopelessly crushed—would never move again.

It had been Bob's own fault. In his first moments of consciousness he told Patty the story. He had been roller-skating on the street and his skate had slipped. One can't collect damages from a truck-driver when an accident is obviously the fault of a broken roller skate. . . . But there were doctor's bills to pay, and a wheel chair to buy; and Patty had hoped for damages. She was overwhelmed.

Something had to be done—and I had not called her "practical Patty" for nothing. The first day her brother was out of bed, most of the townspeople received cards. Said cards announced that Patty would be glad to make cakes, pies, candy and preserves—to order—for any one who was willing to pay for good work. None of the townspeople knew, until much later, that those cards and the stamps on them represented the last of Patty's money.

And the townspeople ordered cakes and pies and preserves and candy. They ordered at first because they were sorry for Patty. They ordered afterward because they liked her cakes and pies and candy and preserves. Their friends out of town began to send in orders, and—well, it seemed as if folk couldn't buy enough. Before long Patty had three helpers and an errand boy. In a year she needed a delivery wagon.

Patty owns a rather large catering business now. She's fairly well known. If I were at liberty to mention her name you might recognize it. Bob is supplied with every comfort that an invalid may have, and he's almost finished studying a profession—one that he can carry on from a wheel chair. His teachers say that he will succeed.

Patty never lets an order go out of her kitchen without overseeing the making of it and the packing. Yes, Patty has made good, but——

I was talking to her the other day. "Well, you're a famous personage now," I said. "You've made a marvelous success of your business."

Patty smiled. "But I'm going to sell out in a few months," she told me, "just as soon as Bobby has finished his course. For," and Patty laughed at my surprise, "I'm going to be married!"

Well, after all, I had no reason to be surprised. Patty is the kind of a girl who will be a wonderful home-maker. And the invalid brother has proved that a man who can't walk may have an object in life—that he needn't be a burden. And yet Patty had done so much with her talents. Suddenly I remembered our conversation of so many years ago. I think she remembered it, too.

"But," I questioned, "won't you miss your work?"

And then I was sure that Patty remembered, for—"It'll be a relief to make chocolate cake—for one!" she answered.

This Editor Had a Corn

A Curious Incident

A magazine editor at one time refused the Blue-jay ads.

He said that nothing could end corns as gently and as quickly as we claimed.

But he went south to play golf. Loose golf shoes brought a corn. He thought of Blue-jay, and one night applied it.

The corn never pained again. In two days it disappeared. The next day he wrote his office to insert the Blue-jay ads.

So with you. If you have a corn it proves that you are skeptical. But soon or late you are going to find out Blue-jay, as millions have already.

Then your corns will go. And never again will you let a corn pain twice.

Why not try it now?

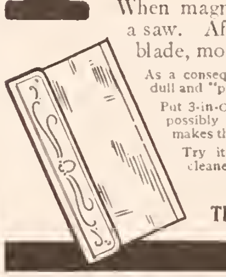
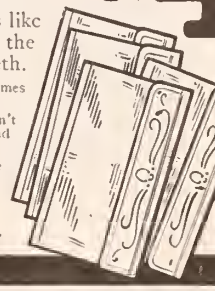
1 Safety Razor Blade does the work of 4





When magnified, the cutting edge of a razor blade looks like a saw. After shaving, no matter how well you wipe the blade, moisture still clings between the microscopic teeth.

As a consequence, very tiny particles of rust form and the blade becomes dull and "pulls".

Put 3-in-One on your blade before and after shaving. Then rust can't possibly form. A little 3-in-One on your strop keeps it soft and makes the razor "cling" when stropping.

Try it and see. Your blades will last twice as long and shave cleaner. Send for our booklet "A Razor Saver" and FREE generous sample of 3-in-One Oil.

Spending Money to Reduce Selling Prices

IF you were going to give a large entertainment, you wouldn't go out personally and deliver a hundred or so invitations verbally, would you? Of course, you would have them engraved and mailed to your guests.

You would in this way spend money to save money and time, which is also money.

Any man who has anything to sell has the problem of getting his invitation to buy before the largest possible number of prospective buyers.

The larger the number he interests, the more units he can make, and the lower his producing cost descends. So he takes the quickest method of reaching a large number of people—printing advertising.

If anyone tells you he is able to sell you his goods at a lower cost because he had no advertising expense, laugh at him.

Advertising reduces sales expense, because a single ad calls on thousands, while a salesman can call on one or two. Advertising reaches an individual at less than 1% of the cost of telling the story to that person in any other way.

Advertising increases the keenness of competition so that prices are forced downward.

It would not be possible to produce a lead pencil for two cents, a tube of paste for ten cents, a collar for twelve and a half cents, were it not for the force of advertising in creating a wide demand, permitting quantity production and labor-saving machinery, thus cutting costs.

There are other reasons why you should insist on the advertised product.

The purpose of most advertising is to establish the reputation of a name. In order to live up to that reputation, definite standards of quality must be maintained in the product. It must live up to the claims of the advertisement. Faking or misrepresentation cannot stand the light of publicity.

Advertising is your protection and safeguard. It points out the lines of goods of whose quality you can be sure.

Write us for free booklet. This is written for buyers like yourself and every man or woman who buys any kind of commodities will find it profitable reading.

JUST DAVID

By Eleanor H. Porter

Author of "POLLYANNA"

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. Simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.

Questions and Answers

VETERAN READER, Worcester, Mass. 1. Do we dishonor God by repeating the prayer for the forgiveness of sin? Does the repetition of prayer indicate lack of faith? 2. Why can I not keep worldly thoughts from my mind in time of prayer? 3. What is it to pray without ceasing? What remains for one to pray for when the age of laboring is past?

1. Jesus told us plainly to ask for the forgiveness of our sins when we pray. John Wesley and others who emphasize the power of Christ to keep us from wilful sin explain this by saying that even when there is no wilful sin, our best obedience comes so far short of God's perfect plan that we need to pray for his forgiveness for our unintentional omissions and our failings. In one sense the repetition of prayer does indicate lack of faith, for when we really believe we have received a thing or are just about to receive it, we naturally cease to ask for it. 2. The human mind is very subtle, and thoughts are hard to control. There is no easy rule for the complete mastering of our thoughts. Constant effort is the only way, and a constant insistence and becoming more and more deeply rooted in Christ. As our love for him grows greater our interest in the things he wishes done becomes keener and our thought follows the line of our deepest and keenest interests. Jesus said, "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." As Christ and his work become more precious to us we shall find it easier to concentrate our minds upon them. 3. To pray without ceasing is to live in the atmosphere of communion with God and to be constantly asking him what he wishes us to do, conscious of the desire that his will shall be done. While there will of course always be special times and places of prayer, we can learn to have a prayerful attitude of mind as we experience the delights of living in God's friendship. The prayer life should grow even richer as approaching age makes it necessary to lessen our activities. Some of the greatest spiritual blessings to whole communities have come as the result of the prayers of those who through age or infirmity were unable to take active part in regular religious work.

C. E. W., Gold Hill, Ore. The belief in immortality is as old as the human race. Long before Christ came that belief was held, although it was not until he made the clearer revelation (John, 14th chapter; II Tim. 1 : 10, and related passages) that the future life began to be more fully comprehended. Heaven is described as a "place"; a condition of happiness; a "kingdom"; a state in which we shall again meet our dear ones; a land where there is neither sorrow nor sighing, sickness nor pain. While our conceptions of heaven, its nature, its extent and the character of its occupations, are still necessarily indefinite, enough is disclosed in Scripture to impress on us the fact of heaven, immortality and the activity and happiness of the life hereafter. (See Luke 23 : 43; Luke 16 : 19-31; Phil. 1 : 23; Matt. 22 : 31, 32; Mark 12 : 26; Luke 20 : 37, 38; Heb. 12 : 1; II Cor. 12 : 4; Dan. 12 : 2; Job 7 : 21; II Cor. 5 : 6-8; Heb. 1 : 14; I Cor. 2 : 9; I Thess. 4 : 14; Matt. 6 : 33; Luke 17 : 20, 21; II Sam. 12 : 23; Matt. 17 : 3; Rev. 6 : 9; Rev. 22d chapter; Rom. 14 : 12; Eph. 3 : 15, and other passages.) Here and now, we need no further revelation; but at the fitting time divine wisdom will enlighten us. Then we shall be able to understand the things we now see "through a glass darkly" (I Cor. 13 : 12), and to realize the fulness of the life that is prepared for the redeemed (I Cor. 2 : 9).

T. M., Oregon. What course would you advise when a young man has been led into skepticism by hearing certain portions of the Old Testament read at family worship? One of his parents advises limiting the family reading to the New Testament; the other thinks that the Old Testament should be read chapter by chapter as well as the New.

There is no doubt that some chapters in the Old Testament would better be omitted in family reading. It would be hard to find any excuse, for instance, for reading aloud the chapters containing nothing but difficult proper names. It is certainly true that some chapters of the Bible are more definitely and practically helpful, more valuable to spiritual culture and character-building, than others. It may be desirable to follow correct pedagogical principles in teaching Scripture and spiritual truth as in other phases of education and culture. Jesus himself said to his disciples: "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now" (John 16 : 12). Paul wrote to the Corinthians: "I have fed you with milk, and not with meat; for hitherto ye were not able to bear it" (I Cor. 3 : 2). One cannot imagine Jesus or Paul persisting in a course of study which was evidently injuring or alienating his pupils. The very fact that this boy has been troubled by some of the Old Testament passages may show the necessity of changing the course for the time being. In the capture and culture of souls it is important to remember that it is indeed the souls we are after. Paul adopted every possible method, that he might "by all means" save some (I Cor. 9 : 19-22). He labored that he might "present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. 1 : 28). The parents should confer and pray together, seeking the best means of saving their children and developing them in the life of grace. They should plan together the passages to be read to the whole family circle. There is no doubt that of these passages lessons from the New Testament should predominate, but by no means be exclusively used, since the historical and other matters contained in the Old Testament are very essential and enlightening to one who would fully appreciate the New. Above all things avoid strife and discord. Nothing will so quickly drive children away from faith and holiness as this.

Friend, Tennessee. What is meant by "coming to Jesus," or by the words "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shall be saved?" Having come to Jesus the best I knew how, and not finding peace, I am at a loss to know what to do. I get worried and fretted, and scold over household worries, and am in great distress of mind.

Many efforts to believe go to waste because they are not sufficiently definite. You have certain definite spiritual needs and you must believe and expect that Christ will positively meet them. To "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ" means first that we trust him to forgive all the sins of the past. We must trust him so completely for this that we have no longer any anxiety whatever about them. Then you must trust Christ to take out of your heart the roots of unkindness, impatience, unfairness, and the other sins which torment you. Then as you trusted for forgiveness and cleansing, you must trust him to keep you, minute by minute, from yielding to sin. Faith to be efficient must have these three positive forms: faith that he forgives, faith that he cleanses, faith that he keeps. What we all need more than anything else is a new gift of love. We need to have our hearts so filled with love for Christ and love for others that it is out of the question to be unkind or to wrong any one. All these things are really included in that beautiful expression you ask about—"Coming to Jesus." While you are conscious of loving him and of loving others because he has put a new love into your heart, you will find it easy to do right and to be kind. And the old life of worry, fear and grief will come to an end.

N. M. L., Delmar, N. Y. Mexico's population, according to the latest Mexican census, was 15,063,207, but the census was admittedly imperfect, and many writers estimate the present population at about 17,000,000; extent of territory, 767,005 square miles.

J. H. Van P., Long Beach, Calif., writes: "I am an American, but my Bible teaches me to love all for whom Christ died. I cannot understand why followers of Christ should advocate war and preparedness as so many do. I believe in diplomacy and in consideration for the other one, by always putting ourselves in his place. What would our people think if Mexico had held an army here? The men from our country have also killed Mexicans." This seems to be the view of many readers: that there are two sides to the Mexican question, and that we are not altogether blameless. Fortunately, the trouble is now in a fair way of adjustment, let us hope without further bloodshed.

Mother, Jersey City, N. J., sends this helpful incident of the result of home hospitality: "In your number of May 17, K. S., California, asked a question. I referred it to my husband and he replied: 'It is a difficult thing to decide upon whom to invite in one's home. I remember a case in a church we attended in a large city. A young man came into the prayer meeting and professed to be a Christian and a stranger. He was received very cordially and invited to a home, but it was not long before he showed himself a thorough fraud.' I have always felt that my home should be open to any newcomer who seemed to be alone in a strange city, and I am sure if K. S., had worshiped where we did, and I noticed he was faithful and alone, I should certainly have invited him to my home. In proof of this we noticed an Armenian in our church some years ago and were impressed by his sincerity, and we made him welcome in our home. In the course of time he boarded in another city and attended service there. In the boarding-house he met the son of a foreign missionary who was attending college. This young man had got into rather wild c pany and the Armenian asked to bring hi to ou home. We consented and would ha mad him welcome no matter how often he red t spend the Lord's day with us. J. S. D., Newton, Miss. 1. The p age in John 14 : 28 (last clause) is one that s been many times discussed and frequen misinterpreted. It was one of the bases o he old Arian heresy. TIMKEN
ROLLER BEARINGS

What's Under the Hub Cap?

Any good anti-friction bearing can give satisfactory service at certain points in a motor car, but a vital question to the car owner is—What's under the Hub Cap?

There is a vast difference between the tests that bearings have to meet on the fan shaft of a motor or the stem gear of the transmission and those which they must meet in the hubs of the wheels.

Under the hub caps, the bearings in your car fight the forces of weight from above and pressure from the side. Resilient springs and deep upholstery cushion the road shocks for the occupants of the car, but the bearings in the wheels must take them for hours without relief. Every cobblestone, rut and car track delivers its blow with the force of a sledge hammer.

Will the bearings in your car measure up to this test?

Some bearings can.

Timken Bearings do—

And the proof of that statement lies in the fact that one hundred and fifty-nine makers of motor cars—pleasure and commercial—put Timken Bearings under their hub caps.

Long before the first motor car was built Timken Bearings were used in the hubs of heavy horse-drawn vehicles, and they made good because the basic principles of their design (which have never been changed) enabled them to resist the forces that caused other bearings to wear out.

Timken Bearings have proven their ability to stand the punishment no wheel bearings can escape. But there are still other places where good bearings are equally essential—fully as important. On the pinion shaft and at the differential where gears must be held in perfect mesh and shafts in true alignment—in the transmission through which full power must come to the rear axle. Here, too, you need Timken Bearings.

Send for booklet D-3, "The Companies Timken Keeps." Know what cars use Timken Bearings—where they are and how many they have. You may have this book free together with another book on the "Care and Character of Bearings" which will give you even a better understanding of the question, "What's Under the Hub Cap?"

There are many sizes of Timken Bearings—but only one quality.

Questions and Answers

P. H. S., Cumming, Ga. 1. Did the Old Testament saints have the same Christian experience that we have? If so, what is the meaning of Pentecost forces? 2. Please explain Jer. 31 : 31-34. 3. If regeneration means the restoration upon the heart of the moral image of God, how is it that the carnal mind is still left? (I Cor. 3 : 1-3.) 4. Can we be tempted through the carnal mind after entire sanctification?

1. Some Old Testament saints were doubtless filled with the Holy Spirit and loved God with all their heart, soul, mind and strength. They could not, however, have had identically the same feeling toward God as Christian saints have, because they did not know the historic fact of Christ's death. The conviction "God sent Christ to die for me," gives the soul a feeling about God not otherwise possible. This was the characteristic of the Pentecostal blessing: it came to hearts that had been melted by the spectacle of Christ's death on the cross. After Calvary and Pentecost, it is easier for every person in the world to realize, as the few true saints of the Old Testament realized, that God will dwell in and fill his soul. 2. Paul discusses this Covenant in Gal. 3 : 15-29. He says the covenant, or promise, came before the law. The law revealed to men their sinful hearts. But in Christ a new revelation of God's love is made, and for those who accept him the promise is fulfilled that they live not under law but under grace. That is, as Jeremiah says, the law is written in their hearts. They keep it because they love the law and love the Lawgiver. 3. We cannot say why this is so, but we know that it is so. Practically every regenerated soul feels, at least for a time, the workings of the "carnal mind." 4. Wesley and those who follow his teachings about entire sanctification hold that even those thus sanctified are tempted. But susceptibility to temptation does not necessarily mean that the carnal mind remains. The carnal mind means a disposition hostile to God; the presence of wrong motives. Even when disposition and motives are cleansed the mind is still aware of suggestions, from the body and from many other sources, to do evil.

Worried Seeker, Lancaster, Ohio. A few weeks ago I gave my heart to God, but I did not feel that I was saved. I tried to believe I was, and for a short time I had the feeling that all was right; but this feeling soon left me, and I am now bothered by all kinds of doubts and fears.

It is the old, old difficulty of relying on feeling instead of upon fact. The fact is that Christ died for you. He died for you whether you think so or not. But you know he did, and while you are simply recognizing that changeless fact you are happy. His death means that God loves you. You know this is true. Why get worried about whether or not something is true when you know it is true? Take God's great love fully into your soul and then go busily about trying to save and help others.

B. A. H., Pennsylvania. I have so many doubts concerning the truth of God's Word, and as to whether or not the prophets and disciples were impostors, I want to be thoroughly convinced.

There are some things in the Bible which you absolutely know to be true, are there not? Now go hunting for these things. Mark the most important ones. See how the number will grow and grow. Rejoice in the facts you know to be true. Accept the many promises you are absolutely sure you can rely on. Begin to tell the good news of these sure things to others and get them to rejoice in them too. You will soon be so busy rejoicing in and working upon the things you know to be true that you will have no time to bother about the things you are now in doubt about.

C. E. R., Benton Harbor, Mich. Senator Morris Sheppard's summary of the German Landschaft Rural Credit system, published in your Christian Herald of March 8, 1916, has just come to my notice. Since then a rural credit bill has been passed, and Senator Sheppard's bill probably pigeonholed. The German plan may have worked for nearly 150 years in Germany, but conditions are very different in this country. The outline makes it appear complicated, uncertain, expensive and slow. No single farmer could use it until a district Landschaft was organized, and then there would be a lot of red tape and delay. The present law is defective in the same manner, and a new, simpler plan is needed. The following idea may not be new, but I beg to suggest that the postal savings be loaned direct to farmers at three per cent. The government pays two per cent. and the added one per cent. is to cover cost of examining title and filing mortgage. This would reduce the interest about one-half and be a real help to farmers with no cost to the government. C. E. Reaves.

Old Subscriber, Savannah, Ga. The passage in I Cor. 15 : 29 ("baptized for the dead") is translated by some authorities, "over the dead," or "immediately upon the dead," referring to those who will be gathered to the dead immediately after baptism. In the early church a very large proportion put off baptism to the last hours of life. Other commentators hold that the passage referred to some symbolical rite of baptism or dedication of the living to take up the work or mission of those who had just died, and to keep it going until they themselves died. In this view of the case, it was not strange that those receiving baptism under such circumstances should receive the names of the dead, whose work they intended to continue, and whose energy and devotion they desired to inherit. The passage, however, is difficult, and it has been the subject of many expositions. Certain heretical sects in Corinth practiced vicarious baptism, i. e., a relation of the unbaptized dead would submit to be baptized in his stead, hoping thereby to have the sins of the dead person remitted. Another interpretation of the passage is that it related to the custom of the living being baptized with the names of the dead martyrs, in the hope that the martyr spirit might animate their own lives.

A FIELD IN AUTUMN

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

Just a field in autumn,
With all the cows agraze;
An' skies that look like turquoise,
A-covered up with haze.
Th' fragrant smell o' haystacks,
Th' hummin' of a bee—
It ain't so much, you reckon?
It means a lot to me!

I tell you, it's the country,
An' more than that, it's home,
An' home is almost heaven
To those who sorter roam.
It brings back days as golden
As any days could be;
For autumn in the country,
Means such a lot to me!

Yes, just a field in autumn,
Cows drinkin' at the stream;
An' everything as quiet
An' peaceful as a dream.
What if the city crowds me?
I'll close my eyes, an' see
A bit o' God's own country—
It means a lot to me!

R. A. Y., Blaine, Mich. There is no mention of four-leaved clover in the Bible. The quotation you have in mind is from an old-fashioned saying, expressive of the silly superstition that it is lucky to pick a four-leaved clover.

P. H. H., Springfield, Ohio. 1. The passage to which you refer is in I Cor. 13 : 10, 11, 12, and refers to the limited human knowledge of the spiritual world, which cannot be perfect in this life. Even the believer receives but a small revelation here of "the things which God hath prepared for those that love him." Visions and dreams were made a means of divine communication to the older prophets, yet even these were but foreshadowings. God's Word is likened to a glass or mirror (II Cor. 3 : 18), in contrast to the direct light of the perfect day. In his discourse at the Last Supper, Jesu old his disciples that he had many things to say unto the but "ye cannot bear them now." Divine wisdom has sely withheld from us a fuller manifestation of the future, s e it is beyond our farthest imaginings. (See I Cor. 2 : 9 Of the "deep things" of God, his divine attributes, natu and counsels, we receive through the Holy Spirit such an a unt of knowledge as we are capable of understanding. one can know of these things but those who are Spirit-taugh and it is this revelation—through the Spirit working in us an with our spirits, and "searching us," which produces the ully matured Christian experience. To all others these sp ual developments remain unrevealed, not because of unw ingness to disclose them, but because the others have neit the will nor the power to apprehend them.

The national epic of Finland. The title-word means The Land of Heroes." It is a poem in which all of the a ient Finnish gods—the deities of the earth, sky, sea, clou the underworld, the lightning, the wind, fire, sun, moc and stars, are introduced in legendary form, with a host of inor characters. The great hero of the story is Wainamoine who was of supernatural origin. The epic deals largely wi the ceaseless conflicts between the Finns and the Lapps, l the lesson of the whole is the struggle between good an evil, darkness and light, ignorance and knowledge. Thi epic seems to have been orally preserved until Dr. Elias Lo rot, a famous scholar, brought it to light, ran down nu ous sources of information, and molded the whole into a mogeneous form, something over a century ago. Lon llow is believed to have drawn liberally from the Kalevala, l h as to poetic form and treatment, in writing his "Hiaw a."

E. R. A., Muskegon, Mich. When paganism gave p e to Christianity, certain of the old festivals were spirit ized and transformed and became Christian observances The change was gradual, and it was not until the third c ury that there was any special observance of the Nativity. Professor Schaff explains it in these words: "The artis religious impulses which produced the whole church ye ultimately called into existence the festival which for the groundwork of all other annual festivals in honor of C st." Our Child-Saving Work in China

AMONG the many missionary enterprises which the Christian Herald and its readers have been led to undertake, few have given more satisfaction, either in a spiritual or nated sense, than our work among the orphans of hin. Beginning in a small and obscure way during he great famines in hat country some fteen years ago, this work of child rescue and training has prea marvelously nd has attained to proportions that ould not have been presn. At the outet, the Protestant issiaries at some wen or more stations throughout the hine provinces ook, sheltered, fed nd cared for some wo thousand little aifs—orphans and alf-orphans — the near being provided hrough the generosy of Christian Herld readers. Many f these were castways who had been esed by their relaives and left to perish. A Central Committ was organized at C kiang, to which ll remittances have een sent, and whose members have made he apportionments mong the orphanages.

In the years that have passed, many of he older children have grown into manhood and womanhood. A number have become pastors, evangelists and Bible-eads, while hundreds of others have been equipped for self-support as farmers, gardeners, artisans, and in various useful vocations. At a number of the orphanages training schools were established, and as these were developed and the influence of the work began to be understood, it won the respect and admiration of many of the best class of Chinese. Now, hundreds of well-to-do natives are beginning to take an active personal interest in the orphans and to contribute to the general upbuilding of the work.

During these intervening years, gaps have occurred in the ranks. There were some deaths among our young charges, but the great majority have grown up to be strong and vigorous, giving promise of careers of usefulness. Under the spiritual care of the missionaries, practically all the orphans became earnest Christians, and many of them, as they grew up, were filled with a desire to work for the salvation of others.

Sixth anniversary celebration at Fukien Industrial Homes, December 28, 1915

At the present time there are about one thousand orphans still under training. Of these, more than half are provided for regularly by patrons through the Christian Herald, each patron paying twenty dollars a year, which covers the cost of shelter, food, clothing, medical attendance and education, both scholastic and industrial.

A majority of the patrons have fallen in love with this work and are in regular correspondence with their protégés, who write to them grateful and encouraging letters. Other orphans, who are not supported by patrons, are provided for by miscellaneous contributions. This form of provision, however, is precarious, and involves hardship for the workers, necessitating severe economies in the administration. The missionaries as well as the Christian Herald would be rejoiced to have a patron for every boy and girl in the orphanages, so that their maintenance might be assured. There is a splendid opportunity here for Christian service, not only on the part of individual patrons, but for churches, Sunday school classes, missionary societies, Christian Endeavors and similar organizations, which would thus get into active touch with missionary effort and imbibe the true missionary spirit.

YANG YU DJI is the Chinese Superintendent of the American Presbyterian Mission School at Nanking. Under his care are some fifty bright young Chinese lads, whose training and general education are provided for by the contributions of Christian Herald readers. Miss Mabel Lee, Treasurer of the Orphanage, writes that they give promise of becoming bright, useful men and excellent Christians.

Superintendent Yang has written an interesting letter concerning his charges, which has been translated for the benefit of those of our readers who are in sympathy with his work. As we believe many others will be interested in what he says, we print his letter below.

"Dear Friends: I thank you heartily for your merciful kindness in helping our Nanking orphans. When they are hungry, it is your kindness that feeds them; when they are cold, it is your gifts which keep them warm. It is not the boys alone who are grateful to you. We all are.

"This year there has been perceptible a great improvement in the boys. They have higher motives

A typical orphanage building, well planned and well built

Boys who are being trained for Christian leadership in the new China and they are gradually leaving any bad habits, and aiming at the higher things of life. The majority are Christians, eight having been baptized this year, while several others are inquirers.

"School standards are much higher than last year. More than six of the boys are ready to go to the Middle School. Last May, the Literary Society of Nanking invited over nine hundred students from more than twenty of the schools to meet for a contest in school work. Our boys won the first three prizes in Chinese, English and arithmetic. The chairman gave them as prizes, three bundles containing books, ink, pens, etc., which made them all very happy.

"Now we are preparing for the athletic contest. All the boys are well and strong. God's blessings have been bestowed bountifully upon us.

"One who enjoys eating delicious fruits always thinks of those who planted the trees. So if it were not for your love, thought and generosity, our boys could not have all these blessings. We have not words to express our thanks.

"It is hard to get good teachers and the chance to do industrial work is very small; but our boys do well. They can even make their own clothes. In short, we are trying to do our best in everything, so as not to disappoint you."

ONE of the most remarkable developments of our Chinese orphan work has been the wonderful growth of the Christian Herald Fukien Industrial Homes, near Foochow. This enterprise is due to the energy and self-sacrifice of a splendid Christian woman, Miss Emily S. Hartwell, who from very small beginnings has succeeded in building up a fine organization. Miss Hartwell's enthusiasm has attracted to her assistance a number of friends, both Chinese and American, who are bending every energy to make the work permanent. There are considerably over one hundred little Chinese orphans at the Fukien Homes. The site is a most suitable one, affording ample space for dormitories, schools, industrial training shops and other buildings of various kinds. It is a very hive of activity, and the progress made within the last two years has amazed even the Chinese themselves. The enterprise has been incorporated in the United States, and now has an organization in which both American and Chinese are represented as members of the board of directors. It is still largely dependent on the support it receives from God's people in America.

Pastor Philip S. S. Yu, the Chinese chairman of the Christian Herald Fukien Industrial Homes, while in America lately as delegate from the Methodist Church at Foochow to the General Conference, in company with Bishop Lewis visited the Christian Herald offices in New York. The two explained fully the present conditions and prospects of the Homes at Fukien. Pastor Yu is not only the Chinese chairman of the Homes Board but is also on the Finance Committee, together with Mr. Nga, whose name you find on the Board of Managers as Hon. Ni Wen Shiu, Superintendent Yeh and Miss Hartwell. He has rendered distinguished service for the Homes in securing aid from the authorities under Governor Hsu, and from the Salt Bureau and many of the gentry of Foochow.

Clear-headed boys who are being given their chance by Christian Herald readers

He represents the high class of Chinese leaders who are associated with the missionaries on the Board of Managers.

MISS HARTWELL in a recent letter writes: "Had not the Christian Herald come to the front to help us in the initial period of this work for the destitute children of Fukien, it would simply have been impossible for it to have been opened. Years of experience have brought the Homes to such a stage of advancement through the interest and gifts enlisted from Chinese sources, that we now com o th Christian Herald Family with the hope that t y wi be able to help inaugurate an advance in the w k an to place the Christian Herald Fukien In stri Homes in a position of security which will m e th work an example to the entire empire. Th ftin of the heavy political clouds makes our ap al o double force, as now must be the accepted b r fo China. For us, who stand for peace and t fo bloodshed, the winning and preserving the sy path of one quarter of the human race is of vital imp ance With the accession of President Li Yuan H g, w have as the new watchword for China, 'L , no Force.' We see China saved by her own det nina tion and not by any outside power, and we se Chin saved by the self-restraint of her own leade wh have been able to thwart all the machinations o apan ever watchful for an opportunity to assert sup nac at the first indications of a lack of law and or . I China has not earned the respect of every atio for her unwillingness to see the blood of her eopl shed, for her unwillingness to return to mo rchy for her determination to act guardedly and wi self restraint, what nation has earned it?

"I am constantly approached by leading ines begging Americans to come to the help of Cl a in dustrially at this time. The leading Chin ar asking for the return of Governor Hsu to this p ince Should he return we have every hope of hi varn cooperation in helping the Homes. The Cha er o Commerce are helping the Homes through t r in fluential leaders. The outlook at Foochow mos promising, but the financial situation is seriou Th thousands of troops sent here by Yuan have een great drain on the resources. Business is ver nuc disarranged. Our immediate need is some tho ghly equipped foreigner sent out here to take ch ge o our industrial work in the Christian Herald omes Delay will be a very serious loss. May God o n th way for the Christian Herald to lead in this w k.

"As industrial enterprise is to be one of t mai objects of President Li Yuan Hung, the Fukien omes are incorporated, to take advantage of the w erfu developments that will come in the near futu In fluential leaders in the Foochow Chamber o Com merce are doing their utmost to enlist finan help for our industrial work, and if the Christian erald will send us a thoroughly trained, technical n to superintend the industrial work at Pagoda Anc rage, the greatest opportunity of the age may be r t, for the development of this industrial power is vital concern to all interested in Christian growth in ina."

There are doubtless many readers of this urnal or their friends who would be glad to be enr ed as patrons of the Fukien Industrial Homes, wher every dollar contributed is put out to the best ad ntage and will produce practical results. The sup rt of a boy or girl in the Fukien Home is $20 a year. Miss Hartwell will personally communicate with each tron.

A Day With the British Navy

AMONG the souvenirs of my recent visit abroad is a bit of paper which by the tragedy of war has acquired historic value. It reads: "H. M. S. Ship—The Indefatigable—Program of Concert—'The Busy Bees' in Song and Mirth." It evokes memories of a wild March day—a Y. M. C. A. hut somewhere along the east coast of Scotland. The occasion was a naval concert given by the crew of His Majesty's Ship Indefatigable, under the patronage of Lady Beatty, wife of Sir David Beatty, Vice-Admiral of the British Navy. The motor car which awaited us whirled us through the streets of a quaint old Scotch village to the naval docks, which nothing less than Lady Beatty's personal signature could have opened to one not of British birth.

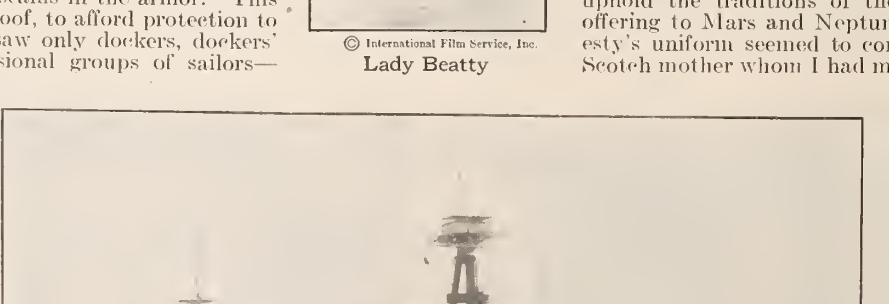
Lady Beatty

We passed blooming gorse and some fine old trees, but at the docks there was not a tree or other green thing in sight. Only a village constructed of iron and steel sprawling on the sands, like a giant knight in armor, St. Margaret Street, King and Queen Streets and other thoroughfares therein appearing as seams in the armor. This war village is Zeppelin-proof and bomb-proof, to afford protection to five thousand dock-dwellers. Here one saw only dockers, dockers' wives and dockers' children, with occasional groups of sailors—visitors from that other iron village, that great fleet of dreadnoughts, men-of-war, armored cruisers, destroyers and mine-sweepers, which lay out on a sea that glinted like steel in the cold March sunlight. There was not a touch of color in that grim landscape—no blooming gorse to suggest love, but everywhere the forbidding aspect of war.

Closer inspection, however, revealed many an attractive home enclosed within those iron roofs and walls. These dockers' wives seemed to possess a talent for home-making which triumphed over their bleak surroundings, while children played in the sand in careless glee.

The Y. M. C. A. hut was one of hundreds that have arisen since the war. The auditorium in these huts is not exclusively devoted to religious services, but wholesome entertainments are staged. A clergyman confessed to me that he not infrequently kept the score of a boxing match which preceded his mon. There is a stage at one d of the hall, and at the er a restaurant where food a non-alcoholic drinks are di nsed by volunteer workers; a rd at the door invites the s r to enter the cozy writing-room and "Write a Letter to Mother. The dining-room is well patronized by dockers and sailors, whil adies of fashion and title serve as waitresses. Bath rooms, lock and cubicles for the sailor on land-leave show what the Young en's Christian Association is doing for the comfort of "the man beh d the gun" on sea and land.

The concert was to be given in the hall, and the actors, a elect corps from His Majesty's Ship Indefatigable, were reh sing. Stage curtains and scenery had all been painted on board ship Long before the hour arrived, the jackies came pouring into the hut They filled the chairs, they crowded the aisles, they climbed on t restaurant bar; they sat in the windows and squatted Turkish hion on the floor. Just boys, barely more than children, who re to uphold the traditions of the British navy. A nation's sa ficial offering to Mars and Neptune. The immature figures in H Majesty's uniform seemed to confirm the challenge of a broken-h rted Scotch mother whom I had met in Edinburgh only a few days fore. as her seventeen-year-old son m ched away with a company of boys ound for the front.



Battle cruiser Indefatigable, which carried her men to death

"Dinna call this war! It is rod's murder of the bairns!"

And one wonders if a nation's onor is upheld by the slaughter of ch ren'

The program was well ex ted, and would have made a fort e for any Chautauqua manager on o side of the water. Now that th jolly marchers in pink coats, rakis pink caps and white trousers and sh s are lost in the deep and those ric enor voices are forever stilled by th ea. I recall the insistence of one rain. Whatever they sang, whethe rave or gay, their longing was voice the refrain,

"When the war is over."

Often the entire audience cau t the words, and more than a th sand boyish throats poured out the rain and gave it the volume of t sea.

"When the war is over."

Strike Situation in the Hands of Congress

PEACE in the great railway strike, which had seemed within the measure of possibility early in the week of August 20, began to assume more and more the nature of a mirage as the week progressed. It became evident that neither the unions nor the railways were prepared to accept enough of the other's demands to meet on common ground. The railway managers finally reached an agreement as to the proposal which they would ask the President to make for them to the unions. But before the committee of managers could meet the President, the whole question was put beyond negotiation by the announcement that the brotherhoods had already issued the order for a strike, to become effective at seven o'clock on the morning of September 4. The committee of managers saw the President Monday morning, August 28, but did not hand him the formal proposal which they had prepared, although they acquainted him verbally with its content.

The President at once called in the leaders of the Senate and House, both Democrats and Republicans, spending a considerable part of Monday in conference with various committees of the national legislature, developing a plan of legislation which he hoped might not only settle the present strike, but prevent the development of a similar condition in the future.

President Samuel Rea of the Pennsylvania made a statement for the management of the railways in which he declared that to accept President Wilson's original proposal would be to destroy at one blow the principle of arbitration as the paramount and recognized method of settling labor disputes. He stated that the result of previous arbitrations had brought a continuous advance of wages, and that only the reduction of grades and increasing of motive power, permitting the handling of larger trains and greater efficiency in every element of transportation, had enabled the railways to keep out of receiverships before the recent rate advance, all the advantages of which would be wiped out if the railways granted these new demands of the highest paid group of employees on their lines. He also called the attention of the public to the fact that these same unions had been active in securing the passage of full-crew laws and other legislation which increased the cost of transportation without benefit either to the railways or the public. The unions replied by calling attention to the fact that Mr. Rea's railroad had constantly refused to arbitrate questions arising between itself and its men and denied again that the cost of the eight-hour day and the rearrangement of schedules such as would be made necessary would produce any such increase in cost as the railways claim.

On Monday afternoon it was announced that the President would go before Congress on Tuesday with a request for legislation. The railways continued to prepare themselves to fight the strike. Some of the larger roads were confident of their ability to maintain necessary traffic, claiming that a great many men who voted for a strike voted for it because they felt that the vote would be used as a bluff and that the strike would never be called and that these men would not strike. The unions, on the other hand, claimed to have the situation well in hand, and felt certain of an early victory.

THE President appeared before the two houses of Congress on Tuesday afternoon, August 29. He reviewed the history of the strike, explained his own efforts to settle it as the spokesman of the nation, stated that he had been unable to bring the opposing parties to an understanding, and stated again his opinion that the railways would be forced in any event to accept the eight-hour day. The President said, "A situation had to be met, whose elements and. fixed conditions were indisputable. The practical and patriotic course to pursue, as it seemed to me, was to secure immediate peace by conceding the one thing in the demands of the men which society itself and any arbitrators who represented public sentiment were most likely to approve, and immediately lay the foundations for securing arbitration with regard to everything else involved. The event has confirmed that judgment. I was seeking to compose the present in order to safeguard the future, for I wished an atmosphere of peace and friendly cooperation in which to take counsel with the representatives of the nation with regard to the best means for providing, so far as it might prove possible to provide, against the recurrence of such unhappy situations in the future—the best and most practicable means of securing calm and fair arbitration of all industrial disputes in the days to come." The President then presented to Congress six propositions which he thought should be enacted into law at once: First, the immediate enlargement and administrative reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission as provided in the House bill now pending in the Senate. Second, establishment of an eight-hour day as a legal basis of work and of wages of all employees operating trains in interstate transportation. Third, the authorization of a small body of men to observe the results and experience of the adoption of the eight-hour day in railway transportation and to report to Congress at the earliest possible date. Fourth, explicit approval by Congress of the consideration by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the consideration of advanced rates of such increased expenditures as might be involved in the working out of the eight-hour day. Fifth, an amendment to the existing Federal statute which shall provide for full public investigation of industrial disputes before a strike or a lockout might be lawfully attempted. Sixth, the lodgment in the hands of the Executive of power to operate the railways of the country as may be required for military use, and to operate them for military purposes, with authority to draft into the military service of the United States train crews and administrative officials as circumstances might require.

THE first proposal does not interest the men particularly; the railways are heartily in favor of it. The second proposal the men would like to see enacted, and the railways announce that they will fight it in Congress and in the courts to the last ditch. The third proposal finds the brotherhoods indifferent; the railways would be glad to have it if the second is carried. The fourth proposal the brotherhoods are said to be passively against, and the rail-

They had their dreams, these blue-eyed, fair-haired lads. For they were virile young fellows, athrill with life, warm red blood in their veins, and it was nation's call that linked the refrain.

"When the war is over,"

with thoughts "For Betty and the baby." And boisterously but tenderly they joined the two in song; "When the war is over" there was to be "Betty and the baby."

For them the war is over. In the great sea-fight of May 31, His Majesty's Ship Indefatigable went down with seven hundred and fifty on board. The Indestructible and other ships whose names we saw on sailor's caps that day were also sunk. The treasury of the sea holds in its sunless depths all those golden young heads. And today and forever after Betty, many and many a Betty, must go on in life alone with a great void in her heart and the never-ending tug of an empty breast. She, too, must suffer to uphold a nation's honor.

The day that invokes these memories was made possible through a telegram signed "Ethel Field Beatty," granting an interview with the wife of the vice-admiral of the British navy. A British express and March snowstorm whirled me into Aberdeen. Lady Beatty has the simple, direct manner of her father, the late Marshall Field, and she has inherited likewise much of the genius of Chicago's merchant prince. It may be said that her brain has as many activities and as diversified interests as her father's famous store.

Devoted to her father's memory and loyal to the city and land of her birth, she is just as truly a patriotic British matron. One moment a proud and happy wife and mother, whose interests center in her home, the next she startles you with her world knowledge and political acumen.

Though Hanover Lodge, her magnificent London house, has been turned over to the government for the use of sick and wounded soldiers, though she is the patroness and chief financial support of the Y. M. C. A. hut dedicated to the comfort of the jackies of her husband's fleet, and though hardly a day passes without patriotic response to some call for service, Lady Beatty modestly disclaims any valuable service and deprecates publicity. As she modestly declared, "When one has a husband and child and home to care for one cannot do much." But when I spoke of Admiral Beatty, a wife's pride in her husband was manifest. This led our conversation to the duration of the war, and Lady Beatty expressed her belief that the war had only begun. Not only was peace not in sight, but all peace talk was premature.

Then my hostess flashed forth the query which I so often met while abroad: "When will the United States come in?"

As usual, I explained that we were devoutly hoping to keep out, and even suggested some of the advantages afforded to the Allied nations by our neutrality.

"Oh, yes," was her reply, "we get ammunition from you, but that is business. You send us ammunition and we pay for it. The five-hundred-million-dollar war loan must be paid, with interest on every bond. But if the United States came into the war, your government would have to furnish ammunition free, and that half a billion dollars would be only a part of your share of the war expenses. And that would be better for us than neutrality, would it not?"

Lady Beatty is also one of the many I met on the other side who favor our participation in the struggle, but hold at the same time that if Uncle Sam enters the war, he should withdraw when that intervention has aided in assuring victory for the Allies. This, they say, is because Uncle Sam's well-known tender-heartedness might make him a too lenient party in the peace pact.

"The Allies must dictate their own terms," she declared, thus dissolving into nothingness the beautiful, iridescent bubble of peace intervention which has so long dazzled American vision.

Although Japan and Germany are the favorite bogies with which to conjure our republic into assuming the burden of an imperial army and navy, Lady Beatty confessed to the fear that the next great struggle would be between Great Britain and the United States. With only an imaginary boundary line between our country and Canada, it is very important that the friendliest feeling should exist between the two nations, and a policy of preparedness on our part, which must of necessity stretch a four-thousand-mile double line of fortifications along the Canadian border, would not be conducive to the cultivation of such a spirit. It would be far more likely to render conflict inevitable.

One wondered if the vice-admiral shared her fears. And can it be possible that the doctrine of preparedness is a two-edged sword—a weapon of offense as well as defense in our international relations?

Ere my visit was over, Lady Beatty generously gave me an invitation to the naval concert I have described, and, turning to her desk, wrote and signed the pass which made possible my visit to the naval docks.

It was late in the day when I left Aberdeen. I waited to watch the setting sun, and lingered into the early northern twilight that so quickly followed. On the high bridge I looked down upon the distant village and upon the British ships lying in grim majesty off the shore. Darkness was settling upon them and they were rapidly becoming indistinguishable.

Then suddenly the searchlight was turned on. It blazed across the sky in quest of an aerial enemy; then it swept the sea, illuminating its broad expanse and transforming the waves into a thousand blazing jewels. Then the line of light was again turned skyward, and when I looked down, black night had swallowed the iron village on the sands, and the distant city of the ships of death. The great fleet was engulfed in darkness; the outlines of dreadnought, man-of-war, armored cruiser, destroyer and mine-sweeper became more and more ghostly, and finally disappeared altogether, until they seemed as remote as the dread monsters with which a superstitious age peopled the deep, worshiping and fostering them in the belief that thereby they attained security and greatness. American Cruiser Wrecked. The United States armored cruiser Memphis, until last May the Tennessee, was wrecked by a tropical storm in the harbor of Santo Domingo, August 29, dragging her anchors and being forced on the rocks of the outer harbor. Of her crew twenty were lost in a motor-boat in the harbor, and thirty-five were dead or missing at last reports, while about fifty were injured. Most of the casualties resulted from the breaking of a great steam pipe while the Memphis was fighting her way to sea in the teeth of the storm. This accident stopped her engines and a great wave threw her on the rocks. The Memphis was built in 1904, had a displacement of 14,500 tons, and a speed of 22 knots. She was the flagship of the cruiser division of the Atlantic fleet and carried the flag of Rear-Admiral Pond. The Tennessee was sent abroad at the beginning of the European War with nearly $6,000,000 in gold for the relief of Americans stranded by the war. She transported several thousand Americans from Havre to English ports and later went to the eastern Mediterranean, where she carried many thousand fleeing Syrians and Armenians from Turkish ports to Egypt, her launch being fired upon by one of the forts in the harbor of Smyrna.

A Year on the Great Canal. During the fiscal year July 1, 1915, to June 30, 1916, 787 ships, carrying a total cargo of 3,140,046 tons, passed through the Panama Canal. The tolls were $2,399,830.42. The total amount expended on account of operation and maintenance of the canal was $6,999,750.15, leaving a deficit for the year of $4,599,919.73, of which the cost of dredging away the slides in the Gaillard Cut (formerly Culebra Cut) was $3,513,350.06. During the preceding fiscal year 1,088 ships carried 4,969,792 tons of cargo through the canal and paid tolls of $4,343,383.69, showing a surplus over cost of operation of $276,656.38, or .67 per cent. of the cost of operation and maintenance alone. The canal was closed during the last fiscal year from the middle of September until the middle of April. A number of regular steamer lines have recently changed their route, sending their ships through the canal, and the traffic will increase steadily during the coming year. The dredges are still maintaining about the same rate of excavation in the cut as prevailed during the removal of the slides.

Naval Escort for Pacific Liner. The Pacific mail liner Ecuador sailed from San Francisco to the Far East on August 28, reestablishing the Trans-Pacific Line under the American flag. The battleship Oregon convoyed the Ecuador through the Golden Gate.

President Signs Defense Bills. President Wilson on August 29 signed the army and navy appropriation bills, thus completing the Administration preparedness program. The army bill had been repassed in record time, eliminating the clause to which the President objected in his veto message. The President also signed the Philippines Bill and the bill providing for a uniform bill of lading, the last bill having been sponsored by the business interests of the country.

The End of the Pale. A committee of the Russian Duma has recently returned after a visit to England and France. The committee has seen the Jews fighting loyally under all flags; it has seen them respected and successful citizens in all trades, and as a result of this and of the pressure of public opinion throughout the civilized world, it is said that there will soon be introduced into the Duma a bill abolishing the Pale, which has been the chief element in the Russian persecution of the Jews, since it limited them in residence and in occupation and confined them in the closely congested districts of southern and western Russia. It is possible that the world war may have as one of its benefits the granting of real freedom to the people of Russia, including the Jew.

Island Treaty Forces Elections. The Landsthing, the upper house of the Danish legislature, voted, on August 25, to refer to a general election held under the new fundamental law the proposed sale of the Danish West Indies to the United States. The majority in the Landsthing had first opposed the postponement of the sale until after the war. Being defeated in this they forced reference of the question to a vote of the people. A new Folkething will be chosen about the middle of October, and a new Landsthing the latter part of the month. The first meeting of the new Rigsdag will be held early in November, when the proposal to ratify the treaty with the United States will again be taken up, with considerable probability that it will be ratified.

The Honest Ballot in Argentina. Dr. Hipolito Irrigoyen, the new president of Argentina, is the first head of that state to be elected on a radical platform. The radical party was organized to fight for fair elections, and according to one leader the party has ideals but no program. Dr. Irrigoyen is sixty years of age, a self-educated son of the poor, and now a multi-millionaire. He has been the leader of the radicals for twenty years.

Our Navy Program. Secretary Daniels in a recent interview compared the construction authorized by the Navy Bill, just approved, and the construction authorized in the preceding ten years. According to his figures, the present bill authorizes ten battleships, six battle cruisers, ten scout cruisers, fifty destroyers, nine sea-going submarines, fifty-five coast submarines, three submarines of 800 tons displacement, two gunboats, and eleven auxiliaries, with a total displacement of about 813,000 tons. In the decade from 1906 to 1915, there were authorized seventeen battleships, fifty-eight destroyers, eighteen auxiliaries, three sea-going submarines, sixty-three coast submarines, two gunboats and two tugs, with a total displacement of 767,194 tons. The vessels authorized under the recent act are estimated to cost $545,000,000, with a possible additional twenty per cent. to be used in expediting construction, bringing the possible expenditure to $654,000,000. The cost of the vessels authorized during the preceding ten years will be, since some of them are not yet completed, about $319,000,000. All the vessels included in the "new navy" authorized from 1883 to 1915 cost about $700,000,000. The Secretary stated that at least 106 of the vessels just authorized would be under construction within six months.

At last reports Lee was in the Tombs prison in New York City awaiting return to the Michigan City, Indiana, penitentiary. PARALYSIS WANES. The number of new cases of paralysis in New York City on August 31 was 60, the daily average for four days being 66 against 107 for the preceding week. A lessening of the rate of infection was also evident in other parts of the country where the disease had become epidemic. The totals in New York City to September first were 8,042 cases, 1,932 deaths.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE sensation of the past week was provided by the declaration of war on Austria-Hungary by Rumania, Sunday evening, August 27, followed on August 28 by the recall of the German minister to Rumania and a declaration of war on Rumania by Germany.

Rumania makes the fourteenth nation to enter the holocaust, and of the European nations only Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Spain, Switzerland and Greece are now at peace—an extremely precarious peace in the case of Greece.

The effect of Rumania's act may be viewed from two standpoints. First, the direct consequences—economic and military—arising from the actual participation of Rumania; second, the indirect consequences arising from the geographical situation of the country, which enables it to provide a highway for Russia to attack Bulgaria from the north, and Austria in Transylvania.

In her declaration of war Rumania sets forth a long list of grievances of various kinds against the Austro-Hungarian empire, but the real cause must be sought deeper. Under the Roman Empire the province of Dacia included all, or practically all, of the present Rumania, together with much of the neighboring Austrian province of Transylvania, besides other territory. This province of Dacia was inhabited by several races at the time, and did not exactly coincide with the present boundaries of the present Balkan countries. The ancestors of the modern Rumanians, as do Rumanians today, occupied parts of the present Serbia, Bulgaria and notably Transylvania. After the fall of the Roman Empire all these territories, for a number of centuries, fell under the sway of the Turkish empire. Gradually, however, the northwestern portion—the Transylvanian territories—were wrested from the Turks by the Hungarians, and incorporated in Hungary and ultimately into the Austro-Hungarian empire, including the population thereof, of the same ethnic origin as the modern Rumanians. Thereafter, and since the beginning of the nineteenth century, revolts of the inhabitants of what we loosely call the Balkans drove the Turks still farther south, and in the Balkan region in our day the four independent states of Serbia, Rumania, Bulgaria and Greece emerged from the ruins of the Turkish power. It is to be observed that the Rumanians claim to be descendants of the Romans themselves. Interesting as this tradition may be, and potent in some ways as the influence of such tradition has been on the political development and the ambition of Rumania, it does not, in the view of the best authorities, have a sufficient foundation in fact to be treated seriously as the ethnic origin of these people. The modern Greeks have a similar tradition to the effect that they are the ethnic successors of the Greeks of the Byzantine Empire, whereas practically all the authorities consider the modern Greeks as one of the peoples of Slav origin, who invaded Greece between 500 and 1400, driving out or exterminating the original inhabitants of Macedonia and the Greek peninsula.

However, be these things as they may, since the creation of modern Rumania that kingdom has had the ambition to unite with its own population in one nation all the peoples inhabiting the adjacent countries of a common ethnic origin, though practically none of these peoples have ever had since the days of the Roman Dacia, a common political existence. The effort to realize this ambition on the part of Rumania has been a hard one. In 1878, after the Turco-Russian war, Russia, whom Rumania had aided in that conflict, took from her the whole of her northeastern province of Bessarabia, on the plea of strategic necessity and ethnic unity. Thereafter, as a result of the second Balkan war, Rumania gained from Bulgaria some territory on her southern boundary, thus in part realizing her ambition in that direction. In the present war Rumania has acted with great astuteness, and played off the two groups of adversaries, both of whom have continuously solicited her cooperation, against each other, with great skill, and sold foodstuffs to each impartially at very high prices, thus enriching her treasury. In none of her actions has there been the slightest trace of sentimentality, her ever-present object being the achievement of her territorial expansion, with the least risk to herself and the greatest certainty both of entering into possession of and retaining whatever territory she might gain.

What the final bargain between Rumania and the Allies is we do not know, but it seems highly probable that it includes four principal items: the cession to Rumania by Russia of the province of Bessarabia; the guaranteeing to her by Great Britain of funds sufficient to carry on her part of the war; the guaranteeing of sufficient ammunition, and so forth, to enable her forces to remain in the field, an absolute necessity to Rumania as she possesses practically no sources of supply of war munitions within her own borders, and these can easily be supplied from outside sources, as the United States and Japan, through Russia; and fourth, the guaranty by the Entente Powers to Rumania that any portions of Transylvania or of Bulgaria her troops may occupy during the war will be apportioned to her in perpetuity at the end of the war if the Entente Powers are successful. Finally, the agreement between the Entente Powers and Rumania probably also includes the cession to Rumania at the end of the war by Russia of the whole or such part of the Austrian Crown land of Bukowina as Russia may then hold.

It will be observed that the bargain is not a bad one for Rumania, and an analysis justifies her in taking the chances of the combat. Bessarabia is today fully in Russian possession, Bukowina partly, though precariously so, and hence the one is deliverable certainly, and the other to a degree. England can finance and Russia can provision, hence the only absolute uncertainty is the extent of territory Rumania can conquer from Austria and Bulgaria.

The question now to be considered is, what, in return for the above, Rumania can deliver of advantage to the Entente Powers; and as said before, this divides itself into the two questions of what she can deliver herself, in economic and military strength, and what as a result of her geographic position. Economically the assumption of a hostile position by Rumania is a considerable disadvantage to the Central Powers, and therefore, by implication, an advantage to the Entente Powers, though directly it is none. Rumania is a country which produces a very considerable surplus of foodstuffs, over and above the needs of its own population, which surplus is exportable. Since the beginning of the war all of this surplus which has actually been exported has gone to the Central Powers, since with these only has there been any means of communication, except with southern Russia, which stood in no need of grain, and so forth. Great Britain has, it is true, bought some grain in Rumania, but under the agreement, in view of the impossibility of delivery to her, to store the same in Rumania till the end of the war, the real object of such purchase being, therefore, to prevent such grain going to the Central Empires. In addition to dealing in her own grain since the war began to the advantage of the Central Powers, Rumania has also imported from southern Russia very considerable quantities of foodstuffs of various kinds, much of which has ultimately found its way into Austria. By Rumania's entry into the war, these shipments of foodstuffs to the Central Powers will cease. How important the effect of such cessation of grain shipments would be to these empires cannot be said with great accuracy, as we know but little in regard to the present harvests in those empires. If the harvests are good, as has been reported, the effect, of course, would be less, whereas, if the harvests were poor like those of last year, for instance, the effect would be very considerable, though it ought also to be said that the bulk of such shipments was of wheat, the bread made from which would only be used in case of necessity by the bulk of the population of the Central Empires, who, strange as it may seem to Americans, much prefer bread made of rye. So much for the economic phase.

Field Marshal von Hindenburg

From the military standpoint Rumania will add in man power to the forces of the Entente in the southeastern field perhaps 600,000 men. This force includes a higher proportion of cavalry than in any other army in Europe, and is, or was, rather deficient in artillery. Probably about 200,000 are troops of the first line, 200,000 trained reserves, and 200,000 untrained or very slightly trained reserves. Two further facts must also be taken into consideration. The Rumanian is not physically the equal of the other Balkan peoples, and for forty-odd years no actual field test of the quality and efficiency of the Rumanian army has been had (the few weeks' campaign against the Bulgarians at the close of the second Balkan war being hardly countable, as the real Bulgarian army was then completely occupied with the Serbians and Greeks), so that in a general sense today this army is an unknown quantity.

The indirect consequences (this term is used merely for the lack of a better) are considerable and will perhaps prove much more important in the long run than the participation of the Rumanian forces themselves. The country abuts on Russia to the northeast, on Bulgaria to the south, on Serbia to the west, and on Austria to the northwest, and affords a direct high road for the Russian troops to attack either Bulgaria or Austria or both. Today, therefore, it is in the power of Russia to move troops either directly south from Bessarabia by land, or across the Black Sea to one or more of the Rumanian seaports, or by both means, and attempt to overrun Bulgaria from the north, while her allies in Greece, at Salonica, deliver a simultaneous assault on that country from the south, which maneuver, if successful, would probably completely crush Bulgaria and, more than that, cut the line of Teutonic communications between the Central Empires and Turkey and Asia Minor, with all the results both to Bulgaria and Turkey, and also to the Central Empires, that such cutting off from each other would imply. On the other hand, such a movement of the Russian troops could be directed with equal facility, and perhaps with more immediate results, against Transylvania, the Austrian province to the west, which is really southeastern Hungary, in connection with a simultaneous movement of the Russian troops from southeastern Galicia and southern Bukowina, through the Carpathian passes, also directed against Hungary, which movement, if successful, would enable the two Russian forces to meet in the central plains of Hungary and thus dominate the Austrian Empire so completely as to make her of little further importance as a factor in the war.

The first movement, the attack on Bulgaria, would be more strategically correct; the second, on Hungary, would be the most drastic and lead to the most immediate and far-reaching results. The movement on Bulgaria would also, if pushed to its logical end, subsequent to the overrunning of Bulgaria, permit an attack to be made on Constantinople and, what is more important, the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles, by the Allies from the west, with considerable chances of success, which would in the event of such success permit Russia to send out foodstuffs to her allies and receive supplies from the outside world in a vastly more expeditious and economical manner than she at present can. However, either of these plans of campaign are yet to be realized, and as the possibilities of Rumania taking the action she has taken have been foreseen by the Central Empires and their allies, it seems highly probable that these have taken military measures to render the execution of either plan a matter of very considerable difficulty.

THE situation in Greece is gradually clearing, and within the next few days Greece may join the Entente Powers, but hardly with all her forces or in much more than a perfunctory manner. Some European observers indeed expect to see a permanent division of the Greek people result from their present situation.

Italy has at last declared war officially on Germany. One cause of Italy's hesitation to take this step has undoubtedly been a certain sense of gratitude towards Germany for services rendered to her in the Austro-Prussian war of 1866, since, as a result, Italy was then enabled, though defeated in the field by Austria, to possess herself of Venetia, and so forth. However, a year of war has obliterated this remembrance, and now a formal state of war between the former friends exists. Practically this declaration is merely a recognition of the state of facts which has existed for some months, since the time of the requisition of the German ships in the Italian ports by Italy, and has no particular effect either to the advantage or disadvantage of either Italy or Germany.

IN our customary review of the fighting of the past week we shall be obliged to condense to an unusual degree owing to the amount of space necessarily occupied by the consideration of Rumania's entry into the war.

On the Picardy portion of the western front the early part of last week, the French, after a severe struggle, succeeded in rendering themselves masters of the whole of the village of Maurepas, and also in advancing their lines on a mile and a quarter front, about 200 yards to the east of that town, but farther south were held by the Germans for no gain.

On Monday, August 28, a violent artillery duel in the vicinity of Estrées and Belloy-en-Santerre, south of the Somme, broke out and was continuing when our record closes. On the British portion of this front north of the French, the British made, on August 28, a 200-yard gain on a small front south of Thiepval, and followed this up by another small gain a day later northwest of Givenchy, and still later made some gains east of the Delville wood, and finished the week by a little progress in the vicinity of Bazentin-le-Petit.

On the Verdun portion of the western line the French and Germans continued their struggle for the possession of the village of Fleury, on the north front, with varying fortunes. This was the only infantry fighting around Verdun itself, but the artillery continued more or less active the latter part of the week.

A Zeppelin raid on the London district took place on Thursday, August 24, for which the Germans claimed satisfactory military results; the British reported about 50 casualties.

On the Russian front in Europe there has been but little activity as compared with former weeks. Practically all the fighting has taken place on the line of Stoched River, where the Russians have continued their efforts to break through the German lines towards Kovel, but without success. Farther south in Galicia the Russians have made only feeble efforts to advance from Stanislau to Halicz towards Lemberg. In Bukowina, Russian efforts to drive south were successfully withstood by the Austrians.

A change has been made in the head of the German general staff. General von Falkenhayn has been dismissed and Field Marshal von Hindenburg has been appointed Chief of Staff.

The Eternal Caretaker

*A SERMON BY MERCER G. JOHNSTON

TEXT—I Peter 5 : 7. "Casting all your care upon him; for he careth for you."

"I TAKE great comfort in God," wrote James Russell Lowell. "I think he is considerably amused with us sometimes, but that he likes us, on the whole, and would not let us get at the match-box so carelessly as he does, unless he knew that the frame of the universe was fire-proof. How many times have I seen the fire-engines of church and state clanging and lumbering along to put out—a false alarm! And when the heavens are cloudy, what a glare can be cast by a shanty!"

In the times in which we are living, some one has certainly gotten at the match-box; and the fire-engines of church and state are clanging and lumbering along the highways of the world in response to what the world believes to be not a false but a real and general alarm. And although the heavens are cloudy, the lurid glare is very generally believed to proceed, not from the burning of a shanty, but from a world conflagration.

If ever there was occasion for one to find comfort in God, the immediate present is surely such an occasion. We hear the psalmist crying in one of the "broken-hearted Psalms," "I will love thee, O Lord, my strength. The Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer; my God, my strong rock, in him will I trust; my shield, and the horn of my salvation, my high tower." And again, "God is our hope and strength, a very present help in trouble." If the psalmist's experience of God is a possible experience in our time, foolish is the man or woman who leaves any step untaken, any stone unturned, that might result in such an experience. Happy are they who can now say out of the abundance of their own experience, "This God is our God for ever and ever; he shall be our guide unto death." Happy are they who know in the depths of their hearts that Peter knew whereof he spoke when he set down the words of our text: "Casting all your care upon him; for he careth for you." Happy and very desirable citizens of this world are they who know by personal experience the Eternal Caretaker, and believe mightily in his eternal goodness; and who, because of this knowledge and this belief, dare to think and speak and act freely, fearlessly, irrevocably, and good-humoredly.

HAPPY is the land whose children are to grow up to be lofty-minded, pure-hearted, sun-crowned men and women, because their parents and elders, knowing and trusting the Eternal Caretaker, went blithely about the business and along the way that seemed to be theirs, taking little or no account of the sour faces that sought to frighten them, or the smiling faces that sought to lure them to think or say or do any other thing than just the thing they believed in their hearts their wholly trusted God desired, and not for a moment yielding to the sweetly perfumed temptation to count their lives dear unto themselves.

I could wish with all my heart that we elder men and women, who constitute the moral environment in which the younger generation, with its instinctive fidelity and nobility, is growing to maturity, so fully knew and trusted the Eternal Caretaker who holds this world in the hollow of his hand that we would richly give to this coming generation the wholesome moral sustenance and the inspiration to Christlike heroism for which it has a divine right to look to us, and of which we have no right, other than a coward's right, to deprive it.

Would to God we elder men and women could, if not for the rest of our lives, then at least for a season, take Peter at his word, and, daring to believe that God does in very truth care for us—really care for us—cast all our care upon him, and for once become free agents of the spirit within us, and of the Eternal Spirit of the Universe, who seeks to do his holy will in and through the spirit in us!

Would to God we dared to heed the injunction of Paul to "be careful for nothing"! "I would have you without carefulness," cries this great servant and soldier of Jesus Christ, who knew so well how to fling to the winds the so-called gains of life when they in any least way threatened to interfere with his winning Christ.

Would to God we dared to scale the Mount of the Beatitudes more often and to breathe its fear-free atmosphere more frequently! That we could always be counted upon by our Master to be unconcerned, if not careless, about so much of our treasure as is laid up where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal, the moment it stood in the way of laying up treasure in heaven for ourselves and humanity! That we could be depended upon in every emergency, where the interests of justice and truth are at stake, to take no thought for the morrow, what we shall eat, or what we shall drink, or what we shall put on, or where we shall lay our heads, or who shall call us friend besides him for whose sake we risk our life and all! That we could always answer those who talk to us of danger in the path of duty with the calm gaiety with which Jesus replied to his disciples when they reminded him of the dangers that Jerusalem held for him: "Are there not twelve hours in the day?"—and that we could feel his splendid assurance that it is utterly beyond the power of earth or hell to rob a man of one minute of any one of the twelve hours that enter into God's plan for the life of every man who confides his life to God, the Eternal Caretaker!

A Song of Praise at Sunset

AS the sun was sinking low in the west,
And the woodland aisles grew dim,
A little bird sat on a slender bough
And sang his vesper hymn.

'Twas a song of thanks for the gentle breeze,
And the shade of a friendly tree,
For all the joys of the day just past,
And those of the day to be.

He flew away—and the slender bough
For a moment lightly swayed,
And then in the silent, fast-gathering night
A fervent prayer I prayed.

I prayed for a thankful and trusting heart,
That will sing, like this minstrel brown,
Of the bright day past, and the brighter to dawn,
When life's sun, at eve, goes down.

A. M. G.

I FEEL it increasingly that we Christians who are old enough to know better are careful in a wrong sense and troubled about far too many things; that we are overcharged with the cares of this life; that we are "doped" with these cares; that much of the best that is in us, which, if it lived till it came to the birth, would mean blessedness here and blessedness forever, is choked to death by the cares of this world; and that hundreds and thousands of those who profess and call themselves Christians are living and dying as the fool lives and dies—the fool who said to his soul, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry," but to whom God said, "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee"—I feel it increasingly that many of us who are old enough to know better, and to set a better example to those who are coming after us, are making an awful and altogether unnecessary, and it may be incorrigible, mistake.

"The fashion of this world passeth away," declares St. Paul. This world is by no means to be forever the fashion with the Eternal Spirit in us. The fashions of the human spirit that is akin to God change, as earthly fashions change. The fashion of this world is just one of a thousand fleeting fashions that will play a part in the life of the ascending human spirit. But so many of us act as if it were not so. As if the fashion of this world were the be-all and end-all of the spirit within us. And we overcharge ourselves with the cares of this life, and strangle ourselves with the anxieties of this world, and oftentimes find ourselves on the brink of the grave, with a ridiculous amount and an absurd assortment of uncheckable and nontransportable impedimenta.

IT ought not to be necessary to say that it wo l not be a fair criticism of St. Peter's injunct —to cast all our care, all our anxiety, upon God— say that such an injunction puts a premium upc folly and lethargy. St. Peter was too good a Christi ever to make that mistake. The religion of Jesus c templates the existence of and makes provision the mentally and physically deficient, but it w not founded by nor for such. The message of the l le is: Quit you like men! The watch-word of Chris anity as given by its Founder is, "Let your loins be rded about, and your lights burning"; and St. Pet eries almost in the same breath in which he bids us st all our care upon the Eternal Caretaker, "Be sc r, be watchful."

The thing that St. Peter and St. Paul a the Master had in mind was of course the casting u n the Eternal Caretaker, in whose eternal goodness have taught ourselves to confide, of that paralyzing eling of anxious care that always interferes wi and too often destroys our freedom of thought and ction as servants and soldiers of Jesus Christ. Wh they want us to do is to "clear for action"—to s p for battle. To cast our cares upon God, who kno how to care not only for us but for our cares, and en to enter the arena unencumbered.

The story is told of a European statesman o was rebuked in the following manner by his faith l servant for his continual worry about matters th were beyond his control. "Master," said the vant, "do you believe in God?" "Of course I do came the answer. "Do you believe, sir, that God isted and cared for the world before you came i it?" "Of course I do," he replied. "Do you beli e, sir, that God will continue to exist and care for th world after you have left it?" "Of course I do; ho could you ask such a question?" "Then, sir," s l the servant, "do you not think it likely that, eve while you are in the world, God does not put th whole of the responsibility for the care of the wor upon you, but retains a large part of that respo bility himself?" "No doubt you are right," s l the statesman, kindly. "I shall try to remember and when I have done all that I can for my countr leave matters calmly in God's hands, and try not unfi myself for further service by useless anxiety."

MY brethren, the apostles are right, and o Lord Christ is right. God cares for our worl God cares for us. Our God really and truly cares. G take great care of our world and of as many of us as onfide ourselves to his care, because he so greatly c es for it and for us. "I lay down my life for the eep," declared our Lord in one passionate breath, ar in the next he said, "I and my Father are one." e no two sparrows sold for a farthing?" we h him asking; "and one of them shall not fall on the round without your Father." And then he adds, w a profound assurance, "But the very hairs of your l ad are all numbered."

God is our Eternal Caretaker. In our ther house are many mansions. This world is one tho many mansions. God is our Caretaker whil e ar in this mansion. But that is not enough—c tainl not enough for the human spirit that has a pa on fo immortality—not enough for the ascending rit c man that is never so much its great self as hen stands with one foot on this earth and one foo on th sea of eternity. Our God is, and it is his dea eligh to be, our Eternal Caretaker. Not only in th man sion in which we find ourselves today, but th equally real mansion in which we may find o selve tomorrow, and in each and every one of the in umer able mansions into and through which it is be part of our great experience to venture, our God to be our Omnipotent Caretaker. And this t ng s we ought—ought we not?—to be ashamed t et ou hearts be overmuch troubled by the cares an anxieties of this world. "He careth for us." That is noug to know. Knowing that, one can sing with hitti in his hymn on The Eternal Goodness:

And so beside the Silent Sea
I wait the muffled oar;
No harm from him can come to me
On ocean or on shore.

I know not where his islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond his love and care.

The Test of Tendency

SUNDAY, September 17. Phil. 3 : 14. "I press toward the mark." That is the primary matter: where are we tending? For, after all, we are always tending somewhere. Life is never sta nary. We are always in motion. The choice is no offered to us as to whether we will move or not mo. We are bound to move; we are all the childre of dency, and the direction is left to the decision of th ersonal will.

w, the main tendency of a life is revealed in its ap rently smaller concerns as well as in the greater. A raw shows the direction of the current. Our do nant trend can be inferred from our trifles. Our lea ng ambition is manifest in everything. Everyth is carried in the primary enthusiasm, as the loose th gs on a railway track are caught in the rush and sw p of a passing train. In a truly consecrated life ev "the bells upon the horses are holiness unto the Lo." The apostle Paul swept his tent-making into th ommon passion of his devotion to the Lord. His ve salutations became part of his worship, and dull co entionalities burned with the altar-fires of God. He ad his "mark," and that mark settled the trend of erything.

is imperative, therefore, if we would be in the ap tle's fellowship, to determine our trend, and we de mine our trend when we have chosen our mark. In r life we either drift or steer. To what shall we ste? What shall be our haven? What shall be our go? What is the choice of the great apostle? "I pr toward the mark, for the prize of the upward ca ng of God in Christ Jesus!" The apostle chose wl the good Lord had chosen for him. It was his ho ambition to apprehend that for which he had be apprehended by Christ Jesus. The Lord had ca d him to holiness, to a perfected salvation, to the lil ty of the glory of the children of God!

d the apostle's "mark" was an upward calling. On he surrenders himself to the mark, everything in s life will feel the power of the heavenly gravitati Our mark is always our magnet. If it is the Lo who is "lifted up," he will draw everything in ou life unto him. Ordinary conversation will have th savor of divine communion. Common work will ha something of the life and elevation of worship. E n in our many bewilderments, we shall be moving su y toward the light. Let us choose our mark, " high calling of Jesus," and our life, in all its st gely mingled experiences, will have one trend, on goal, one final glory. J. H. J.

Zeal for Righteousness

MONDAY, September 18. Num. 14 : 11-25. "And now, I pray thee, let the power of the Lord be eat." This was the bitterest hour in the life of th man of God. The people proposed to supersede hi uthority and elect a captain to lead them back to E pt. With unutterable anguish he fell on his face be re them all. The hopes of his life reeled over as a lace of clouds before the wind. The suggestion ca e that it would be better to let the bulk pursue th r chosen course, while he and a remnant became the be nning of a new race. "No," said he, "it can never be for in that case, what would become of Jehovah's gl name? The Egyptians would hear of it, and the na ons of Canaan, and derisive laughter would travel ro d the world."

e then quoted the divine assurances, which God ha given on that memorable occasion when he pl ded that he would pardon the people according to he greatness of his mercy. Let us ponder that le n. When our own interests and God's appear in co lict, there can be no real hesitation as to which m t give way. We must be willing to suffer any and ev y thing, rather than that a sinister bar shall ap ear on the divine escutcheon. The extremest pr ations and bitterest sufferings have again and ag n been endured by the saints, with the sole purpo of maintaining the petitions offered in the daily p er of the church: "Thine is the kingdom, the p er, and the glory, for ever and ever." We must n be unworthy of their deeds or privations. God's h or must be maintained! F. B. M.

God Filling Up Our Deficiencies

TUESDAY, September 19. John 1 : 16. "For of his fulness we all received, and grace for grace." T word "grace" is a difficult one to translate into o modern speech, and when we run across it in the Bible it is easy to pass over it without great thought. The passage quoted above used to puzzle me a good deal, until I came across an interpretation that made the phrase read, "grace in contrast to grace," and that helped me to a new meaning. The verse would thus signify that Christ made up the deficiency we lacked in one direction to match the grace we possessed in another. In other words, each one receives a gift along the side on which he is especially weak.

Study the lives of the disciples and see if this is not true. In the places where they were most weak, they became strong. Peter was a man by nature impatient, impulsive and reckless of obstacles. Later, he became the apostle of moderation, rejoicing in "manifold temptations" for the proof of faith "more precious than gold that perisheth." Paul was the arch-advocate of doctrine and was the pioneer theologian of the early church; but later this grace was matched by a gentler one, and he wrote the great love hymn in the thirteenth chapter of I Corinthians. John, one of the "sons of thunder," a man of fire and eager ambition, becomes the type of affectionate longsuffering, filled with patience, "tarrying till the Lord comes."

We should look to God to fill up our defects. "Ye are complete in him," is Paul's way of putting it.

"Here is courage for the over-timid, fear for the over-courageous, a burden for the careless, and an absence of care for the burdened; a power that can soften the hard and give hardihood to the soft and effeminate." C. S. C.

The Divine Partner as Burden-Lightener

WEDNESDAY, September 20. Num. 16 : 1-22. "O God, shall one sin, and wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation?" In the life-story of all workers for God, crises will arise when wrong motives will be imputed and unkind suggestions passed from mouth to mouth. The disaffection starts with one discontented soul and spreads as fire in prairie grass. At such times we do well to turn to this dark chapter and learn how to behave ourselves in the house of God. In the face of the imputations of Korah and his party, Moses fell on his face before God. He might have alleged past service, urged his claims on their gratitude, or offered to compromise. But on all such points he held his peace and cast the whole responsibility on his heavenly Friend.

It is a profound mistake to carry singlehanded the burdens of the Lord's work. When difficulties come, as they will, they are his care more than ours. He is the main partner in the business. It is for us to consult his wishes, to fulfil his commissions, to do our level best for his interests; but we are not to bear the racket of worry and care which rob us of sleep and break the buoyancy of the soul. A great commonwealth or state must stand behind its ambassadors. It is enough for us to be able to say with Moses, "The Lord hath sent me to do all these works, for I have not done them of my own mind." Let God winnow out your pride and self-confidence, and then let him adjust the matter, either through you or apart from you. When the fact of his presence going with you is realized as a living fact, it will give you rest. F. B. M.

Stopping to Think

THURSDAY, September 21. Prov. 23 : 7. "For as he thinketh within himself, so is he." Solomon would seem to imply that one man is distinguished from another man by the thoughts that he thinks within him. But what about the person who doesn't think at all?

As a matter of fact the average person must be driven to think. Few people do any real thinking unless they have to. We are driven to be thoughtful, some of us by the necessity of making a living, or by the cruel wrench of misfortune, or when sorrow disenthralls us from the ordinary ways of routine life.

The great war, with its startling disruptions and its far-reaching effects on all the life of men, is a vast thought-producer. It has introduced the question "Why?" and "How?" into the counsels of nations and into the minds of those who have been accepting traditional opinions as though they were eternal. No man or woman can afford not to form the habit of getting alone these days and thinking out for himself or herself what these days of shocking disaster and loss of human life mean.

After such a wrack of ideals, you remember how Lincoln called the nation to prayer and in his great message of December 1, 1862, said: "The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present. The occasion is piled high with difficulty, and we must arise to the occasion. As our case is new, so we must think anew and act anew. We must disenthrall ourselves, and then we shall save our country."

Every Christian should be especially thoughtful these days, and prayerful too. Lincoln again gives us a suggestion for our meditation. He said, "I am not trying to find out whether God is on our side, but whether we are on God's side." Let me examine my own heart, my own motives; let me stop and think! C. S. C.

Moses' Prayer and Its Answer

FRIDAY, September 22. Deut. 3 : 18-29. "Speak no more unto me of this matter." Moses drank deeply of the bitter cup of disappointment. That good land beyond Jordan had been the subject of his dreams. No poet could have painted it in more glowing colors. He dipped his brush in rainbow hues as he described it. And now he was not to see it. That one act of impatience and unbelief had wrecked the hopes of a life. He had failed as a leader and as a man of God; and his failure was aggravated by all that had happened in his past dealings with God and the people for whom he would have laid down his life. With all the earnestness of his soul he asked God to reverse the sentence; but it was not to be. The sin was forgiven, but its effects could not be altered or condoned.

But though the petition was not granted in one way, it was in another. Was not the edge of the prohibition turned when, after beholding the land, he died beneath the kiss of God on the summit of Pisgah, where God buried his faithful servant? And was not the gist of his desire gratified when, in the after time, he stood with Christ on the Transfiguration Mount?

We have had experiences of unanswered prayer. After we have prayed not thrice only, but a hundred times, we have become aware that our petition was not in the scope of the divine purpose. By the voice of God's Spirit, by a spiritual instinct, and sometimes by the evanescence of desire, we have grown conscious that we must pursue the matter no further. The thorn is not extracted from the flesh. The beloved must be parted from us. We are not to tread the land of our desire. But there are compensations! He giveth more grace. His strength is made perfect in weakness. Instead of Canaan we tread the streets of God, and find our Lord talking with us. F. B. M.

True Hearts Seek the Highest Good

SATURDAY, September 23. II Kings 10 : 15. "Is thine heart right, as my heart is with thy heart? If it be, give me thine hand." These words Jehu spoke to the priest Jehonadab, the founder of the Rechabites, the first temperance society in history. Jehu was the warrior who exterminated Ahab's followers and the Baal-worshipers. These two men of opposite temperaments, callings and opinions became united in sympathy and purpose in a great reform. The hearts of true men have ever been right for the best good of humanity. The heads may differ about dogmas and doctrine, but these differences should be subordinated to the welfare of mankind.

When any branch of the church affirms that the state is her foe, unless the church administers her affairs, such a church seeks political rather than spiritual power. Is it not true that priestly despotism is more terrible than any tyranny of kings? In the name of freedom, fraternity and universal friendship, the church should keep her hands off the state. E. W. What Milton Wrote on a Bible

RUMMAGING in an old Devonshire attic while home on furlough recently, an English army officer came upon a Latin Bible dated 1581 and bearing on the title-page the signature of John Milton! The famous poet had written on the blank leaf a prayer in these words: "O Blessed Lord God, who hast commanded that we should not adde to Thy Word, nor yet take from it, grant, I beseech Thee, that I may neither think Thy certaine true Scriptures to be doubtfull, nor the uncertaine to be Canonicall, but possess me with awfull and reverent thoughts . . . that I, adoring the fullness thereof, may avoid all hastie, supine, forced, and uncharitable expositions, and fetch my little light and candle of knowledge from that first shine and prime rayes of Thee, the onely Light, my Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen." What a lesson for those theologians of our own day, who, in their eagerness to show their learning, show little reverence for the Book which has given light to the world.

We War Against Suffering

IN the last days of August, the great war in Europe was intensified by the entrance of Rumania in the long line of combatants. Fourteen nations are now engaged in actual hostilities. On one side are Russia, France, Belgium, Britain, Italy, Japan, Portugal, Serbia, Montenegro and Rumania, while on the other are Germany, Austria, Turkey and Bulgaria. Greece, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Spain have till now remained neutral; but it is not improbable that two of these, at least, may soon be drawn into the vortex.

The situation is dark with presage. It would almost seem that the climax of horror and suffering had already been reached; but it is feared that many months more of terrific struggle must be endured before peace again visits unhappy Europe.

Meanwhile, the great Christian army, which has been doing such splendid service in the last two years to alleviate suffering by caring for the non-combatant homeless and destitute multitudes, must keep up its benevolent campaign with redoubled vigor. There is a clear call to duty, to which all should give a willing ear and a quick response. Those who have given of their substance to help the sufferers should give again and yet again.

Our work is not half done, and to halt now would be to forsake the flag of Christ and humanity. We are in for the war until the last sufferer has been helped.

America has done well in sending food ships, medicine and nurses to stricken Europe; but the war goes on, and these are not enough. As we count our blessings and thank God for them, let us remember that all we possess is ours only as stewards, and that "whoso seeth his brother in need and shutteth up his compassion from him, how doth the love of God abide in him?"

The Christian Herald has eleven relief committees at work in the various fields of suffering. With the cooperation of its readers, it has already helped many thousands of widows and orphans in the chief centers of suffering, from France to Palestine and from Baltic to Mediterranean. The persecuted Jews and Armenians have not been forgotten. Now, the need is more urgent than ever. Every battle, whichever side wins, means an access of suffering. It means new-made widows and orphans, desolated homes, sickness, exile, hunger, cold, unspeakable misery and death to all who have no helper.

Can we refuse to give all we can spare of our substance in such a cause as this? God forbid! Let us apply ourselves with renewed zeal and energy to the duty of helping these unfortunates, the widowed mothers and the orphans of the war. Make a second gift, if you have already contributed.

The Christian Herald Family has been in many life-saving campaigns, and has never yet failed to respond to the call of suffering, nor will it fail now! If God so wills, this may be the last great war the world will ever see. Let us help to make it so, by showing the Christlike spirit which regards all men and all races as brothers and equally entitled to sympathy and help. Send your gift today to the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

The Waning Epidemic

MANY sad hearts have been lightened by the intelligence that the widespread epidemic among the little ones is fast disappearing. It has carried off its victims from many homes throughout the country, and one cannot think of these bereaved households without a feeling of deep sympathy. But the little lambs who have crossed the river have been carried over in the bosom of the Good Shepherd, and their loved ones on this side may almost hear their fresh young voices calling from the distance, "Come this way." We are going to them; they will not return to us. How we treasure the little playthings and toys they left us—the bat and ball, the dolls and cradles! How we long for the noises they used to make with their voices and their pattering feet! But now we must look up and not down. Gazing at the unseen, we seem to commune with their happy spirits, as we hurry on to meet them.

The voices of the children are always eloquent. They inspire belief in the recognition of our loved ones in a future world. A colonel in the Civil War remarked that he had learned to love Abraham Lincoln, being associated with the President on various occasions. One evening, while Mr. Lincoln was reading, he suddenly turned his eyes from the book and asked, "Colonel, do you ever find yourself talking with a dead friend as if he were present and still living?" "Oh, yes," said the colonel; "I know the feeling, for it has occurred to me often." "I am glad I asked you the question," said the President. "I did not know that it was common; but ever since my little son died, I find myself talking with him every day." Then, overcome with emotion, he dropped his head on the table. The portion he was reading was a passage from Shakespeare:

> Grief fills the room up of my absent child,
> Lies in his bed, walks up and down with me,
> Puts on his pretty looks, repeats his words,
> Remembers me of all his gracious parts,
> Stuffs out his vacant garments with his form.
> Then have I reason to be fond of grief.
> O Lord, my boy, my Arthur, my fair son!
> My life, my joy, my food, my all the world!
> My widow-comfort, and my sorrow's cure.
> And, father, I have heard you often say
> That we shall see and know our friends in heaven.
> If that be true, I shall see my boy again.

That love continues in our hearts here with increased fervor for the departed dear ones is not to grieve the victims of sorrow, but rather to draw them toward the arms of the children who are waiting and watching for us. Lincoln came closer to God while he felt the force of King David's lamentation: "I shall go to him, but he will not return to me." These same words should console those who have lost their little ones. Live closer to Christ, follow after, and you will meet again those you have "long loved and lost awhile."

The Cost of Preparedness

STARTING out on what promised to be a "mild program" of preparedness, up to the present time the cost of our national defense program—which is now being widely criticized as "far in excess of anything ever voted by the government in time of peace"—stands as follows:

For the Army, $267,000,000.
For the Navy, making us the second world-power, $315,000,000.
For Fortifications, $25,748,000.
For Army and Navy Deficiency, $27,558,000.
For the Military Academy, $2,238,000.

If we add to this the cost of our Mexican border demonstration, the total will be little short of $700,000,000.

This astounding sum is to be paid by the whole people, of course. And it is only a beginning. For a nation at peace with all the world, it must appeal to the average mind as an experiment that is costing altogether too much.

Congressman Kitchin, the Democratic leader in the House, puts the whole matter in a nutshell in these words: "I denounced this navy-building program two months ago, and I see no difference now. It was wrong then; it is equally wrong now, and more, because since then two great naval powers have lost 100,000 tonnage in naval battles. This program calls for $120,000,000 more expenditure than the construction program of all other nations combined for ten years prior to the outbreak of the European War. And yet some say that the country is not crazy. By this action, we are making the United States, in dollars and cents, the greatest militaristic naval nation the world has ever seen."

That is the plain truth of the matter, from the lips of a man who has the courage to obey his conscience and tell it out, even if it displeases the administration he represents.

What does the President think about it? We believe we know what the people think. They do not forget, either, that they themselves must foot the bills for the costly outburst of militaristic madness.

The Silent Majesty of Nature

THERE are minds that are most at home and find the highest enjoyment amid the silences of nature, and there are others that would find their keenest happiness in the deafening clangor of Vulcan's foundry. The news that reaches us of the doings of the intrepid explorer Stefansson in the Arctic suggests such a contrast. For three years he has been continuing a series of discoveries in the regions north of Prince Patrick Land, and he probably will not return to civilization for another year at least. Amidst the northern silences, the hardy explorers are carrying on their scientific labor through the summers and winters. New territory, which is described as "a second Greenland," is said to have been discovered and partly explored. Of the great events that have taken place in the old world since they left it to begin their polar quest they know but little. Millions have died on the battlefields and in hos als, the face of nature and the aspect of civilizatio ave been rudely marred, and the very heavens ren vith the sounds of the titanic strife.

There is something in this strange contras hat recalls the wonderful prose poem of Ivan Tourg ieff, in which he pictures two great mountains, sta ling like colossi on either side—the Jungfrau an the Finsteraarhorn. Their lofty peaks look down the valley and the lesser heights. The sky is pale een, clear, silent. Frost, sparkling snow and ice all around.

"What is going on down there?" asks the ungfrau. "From thy loftier height thou canst see tter than I." In tones of thunder the elder mo tain answers: "Impenetrable clouds veil the eartl . Wait." Ages pass in silence—like a moment; hen the Jungfrau, reawakening, repeats the qu ion. "Blue water, dark woods, heaped-up masses of rea stone with those little insects running all al t—those that have not yet ventured upon our su nits—men." Again another long period of silenc and again the interrogation. "There are fewer be seen;" replies the Finsteaarhorn. "It is g ting clearer down there, the waters narrower an the woods thinner." Still another period of ages of nce and the Jungfrau asks once more. "All is ell," comes the reply from the higher peak; "clear; s ning everywhere; pure white; nothing but snow an ice; all is calm and peaceful!" "Yes; now it is ell," replies the Jungfrau; "let us sleep again." A the twin giants sleep. A cold, green sky, too, sleeps ove the ever silent earth.

Man is but an atom, a speck amid the gi ntic processes of nature. Viewed from the mo tain peaks, the vast conflict now in progress migh ook like a veritable struggle of ants. How futile a the quarrels of men, who fill their lives with hat and violence instead of love and kindness! Go the Creator has put in all hearts the capacity fo ove, friendship, forgiveness. Yet we would wrec the world with our quarrels, were it possible. And hen our struggle ceases the old earth once again aws her coverlets of snow and of verdure over the enes of strife. In the battlefields of this year the f vers will bloom again next spring. The very tr ches will be covered with blossoms.

A Good Testimony

HARRY MONROE, circus man, minstr and outlaw, was a convert of the Pacific G den Mission of Chicago. Like many anothe an, the Gospel preached in the highways and b ays found him out, and he became transformed. was a man of tremendous energy and good abilit and he soon rose to be a force in American evang sm. For twenty-four years he was the superintend t of the Mission, and thousands of men and wome owe their salvation, under God, to his guidance. Billy Sunday was converted there through the reet preaching of Harry Monroe, and Melvin Trott was snatched from the career of a drunkard and b ught into the new life through the same instrumen ity. Monroe was the type of a good soldier, used to ardship, courageous, tenacious of purpose, and h a genial, companionable manner that won the conf ence and ultimately the hearts of those he sought t ave.

His funeral was the occasion of a remarkable d onstration among the class for whom he had lab d so long. Many statesmen might have envied the tr utes of love and affection which that event brought rth. But it is of his last testimony we would spea It was left in the form of messages to old friend who had helped him along the path of righteousness To the one who had led him to Christ he beque hed his everlasting love and gratitude. To others left his acknowledgment of their kindness and frien hip. To his more special associates in mission evang ism he left an adjuration to continued fidelity to rist and zeal for his kingdom. The ministers and angelists were not forgotten. The climax of th testimony was in these words: "I am only a poor ner saved by the blood of Jesus. I have no merit my own. If anything has been done it has been th ugh the Saviour. I have given thirty-six years of life to the Mission, and I would give one thousan ves if I had them." The world pays its tribute t men of genius or of great wealth, or who have done ngs which in a worldly sense were deserving of igh honor, and yet it soon forgets them. Here was man who unknowingly built on a deeper and surer fo dation. He had come into touch with the inne ost hearts of thousands and illuminated their liv by giving them the Gospel. The seed he plante will keep on growing in the coming years.

THE BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

nvalid Public Benefactor

MISS ANNIE SHELLAND, the daughter of a minister in Minnesota, was at death's door with tuberculosis ten yea ago. She decided to take up a cm near the Canadian border, and stad teaching school near by. Her intst in the people about her was sooquickened, and she threw herself hea and soul into plans for the betterme of country conditions. Forgetting herlf, she strove to educate her neighbo and at the same time constantly agited improvement measures before thegislature at St. Paul, until through her activity new laws and appriations for farming schls and new roads were pad. She was appointed on e county roads committee and lected superintendent of schls. In this office she has mo than doubled the number and fficiency of the schools in her district. Every school witn that 3,000 square miles rads is visited by her at least onc a year. Whether she rid drives, walks or plunges thr gh rapids in a canoe Miss Shand makes the trip to the arthermost school. She ha one so much to open up the ountry to new settlers tha her name is well known thrghout the state. This see a strange cure for tuberlosis in these days, when the octors insist on rest and all e pampering one can get. Bu the hardships that this fra invalid underwent only serd to nourish and sustain her for she had discovered a sret deeper than the laws of hysical health. In her selforgetfulness she found new intsts that called forth and proceed greater and greater encies of nerve and muscle and mind. Her cares and buns were those of others, and hey never break us down, for ere is a strange compensation every unselfish service. Ma of the finest things cannot e found for the seeking, bu when we forget their qu in the service of others, like the holy cup which Sir La fal sought, they come to us heralded. Such was the early life of Jesus, who said: "osoever shall seek to save his life sha lose it; and whosoever shall lose his lifhall preserve it." (Luke 17 : 33.)

Nebraska's Riches

NOT every playground can boast seven pairs of twins as regular attendants, but the photographer who looked on at one of the public parks of Omaha found these. The smallest ones are barely six months old and have to play in the arms of their mother, but all the rest can negotiate the swings and slides and teeters for themselves. Such fine, strong, healthy children as these are the wealth of any state or country. Any home that has in it twin babies is doubly blessed. The interchange of life from the play hours of earliest childhood to the ripening experiences of school and college seems to make such ones more unselfish and more lovable than others. Neither can live his life to himself, and so by sheer necessity there is driven home and worked into the fiber of the life the great lesson of thoughtfulness for others and self-forgetfulness. There have been other great and perfect friendships in which two were almost as twin brothers. David and Jonathan are an example. "The soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul." (1 Sam. 18 : 1.)

ortune in Tramp's Vest

TE sight of a tramp picking up a piece of cast-off bread at Bedford Spgs, Md., led a man to have him brght to his hotel, fed, bathed, fitted upith new clothes, and sent on his wa rejoicing. Soon the beggar, who wa Tony Columbo of New York, came ruing back, shrieking that all the savgs of his lifetime were in the old vehe had left behind. They rushed to e furnace room and were in time to ve the clothing, which proved to conin $12,306 in money. For this hed toiled and begged during many yes. And for this same kind of treure men risk all that is best in this lifand the next. It can not be possil that any treasure that can be destred by the touch of a match can ha much value. The true values of lif those that accumulate and make an rich in his old age, cannot be lost or estroyed. Instead of the costly aprel and jewels of wealth we must se the adornment of pure thoughts and holy living: instead of the glitter of accumulated gold we want the radiance of an unselfish spirit which reflects happiness and joy on all around it. Far richer than the things money can buy are the friendships that gather about one who holds his life open for them. And above all there is the opulence that comes only to those who have learned the way to a Father's heart in their daily need. When we set our affection on the things that are above we see how tawdry and short-lived are even the best treasures of this world in the light of the age-long values. Jesus' words are still true: "Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal." (Matt. 6 : 19.)

After Fasting Cannot Eat

DR. H. G. HUFFMAN, an oculist of Youngstown, N. Y., announced that he would live for fifty days without food. He has now finished his fast under the nursing of his wife, but as he tries to eat he finds that the system so long deprived of food cannot assimilate it, and he is unable to take food. He is in a serious condition, and may not survive. Our bodies endure remarkably the hardships of life and are usually able to meet a crisis with success; but there are limits which they cannot pass. It is a sign of actual starvation that the body no longer craves food and cannot take it. We may fast from fellowship with Christ till we no longer feel any desire for him, but for most of us there is always the craving for God which points to a healthy need of him as our soul's food. Jesus says to every hungering heart: "I am the living bread. . . . If any man eat of this bread he shall live forever." (John 6 : 51.)

Memory Blank 13 Years

IN the Iroquois Theater fire in Chicago thirteen years ago there was an employee, Milton Simmons, who was operating a light in the gallery. He leaped sixty feet to the main floor, crawled over bodies to the exit, and was finally rescued and nursed back to life. His injury caused a lapse of memory, and he was unable to remember his home or parents. All this time they were mourning him as lost. Recently another illness necessitated an operation on the brain, and as a result he recovered his memory. The old home and its recollections again became vivid, and a great longing to see his parents filled him. By persistent inquiries he finally located them and made the journey to see them. When his mother saw him again it was as one raised from the dead. We can imagine how strange were those years spent without a past, when all life's experiences drifted away from his grasp and were as though they had not been. And yet there are many who would fain forget the years behind them—years that have been spent in selfishness and sin, without thought of the future consequences or the damage done to other lives. Happy is the man who through daily fellowship with God can lay up behind him a memory of noble thoughts lived out into good deeds! But to the discouraged one there is the promise that even the past cannot hold tyranny over a penitent soul. "I will restore to you the years that the locust hath eaten." (Joel 2 : 25.)

Heroic Warning Saves Towns

DURING the great North Carolina floods recently it was seen that the huge Lake Toxaway dam was weakening. A stream of water began to seep through the masonry, and the watchers sent out the warning that it was doomed. Hardy mountaineer horsemen volunteered to ride down the valleys to warn men, women and children in the little hamlets that would be swept away by the pouring torrents. Traveling short mountain cuts and often risking their lives by breakneck speed along narrow trails, the riders kept ahead of the waters. Many refugees reached heights barely in time, their houses being washed away before their eyes. But not one life in that valley was lost. The tenacity with which people stay settled close by great natural dangers, flooded valleys, volcanoes and earthquake zones has always been a strange fact. After a terrible disaster they quietly move back and go their way undisturbed until another recurrence brings them a warning or else loss and death. We are surrounded, too, by dangers in the moral world, no less fatal than floods and volcanic eruptions. Living on the lower spiritual levels is always a danger, and the only safe course is a dwelling-place on the heights, where life is bracing and temptations can be conquered. This warning to the plain-dwellers is strikingly like the errand of the angel sent to rescue Lot from Sodom. "Escape for thy life; look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain; escape to the mountain, lest thou be consumed." (Gen. 19 : 17.)

Natural Tree Surgery

A CURIOUS process in nature is described by the tree specialist David Brock in a recent magazine. Among willows and poplar trees there is a natural action by which a twig or limb that is not healthy is not allowed to take nourishment from the rest, but is lopped off. Close to the trunk there grows a special kind of cell formation which slowly encircles the undesirable part. It is cork-like and completely shuts off nutrition until the leaves of the branch begin to wither and the first wind finds it fallen off. The scar thus made by nature is quickly healed and the next season the place cannot be seen. True to God's merciful dealings, with his world, this process never sets in till the fall. The law of the orchard as set forth by Christ is inexorable, and it does not apply to trees alone: "Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." (John 15 : 2.)

Plays with Rattlesnake

A RESIDENT of Towanda, Pa., was startled on returning home after a short absence to see her two-year-old child playing in the yard with a strange object. She ran to it and found it teasing a three-foot rattlesnake, which did not seem at all annoyed by it. The guileless folly of this infant was wisdom compared with the fatuousness of grown-ups who toy with temptations and invite into the playgrounds of their life habits that finally turn upon them and poison them to death. They are like the serpents God sent to punish the Israelites: "And the Lord sent fiery serpents among the people, and they bit the people." (Num. 21 : 6.)

The Murderer in Your Town

DID you ever see a cat worry a mouse? But of course you didn't! Whenever your household pet caught one, you went out of the room and shut the door. You realized that it was necessary to have the mouse killed, but you didn't want to watch the process of killing. You didn't want to watch because it was too disgusting. So you went where you couldn't see it. That is, after all, the keynote of the cat's method of killing. It is disgusting. It is unlike the method of any other beast.

There is something that, despite its terror, is magnificent and brave when a wild animal of the forest goes out to kill. For the battle is usually a bit more equal than a cat-and-mouse battle—and it is infinitely shorter. The wild beast of the forest goes out to kill because he requires food, and killing is his only method of gaining it. So he springs upon his prey, and brings it to the earth, and quickly (and, because of that same quickness, mercifully) puts it out of its misery.

A cat seldom actually needs a mouse as food. For the average house cat is a well fed, sleek animal, who had much rather drink milk than eat mice. A cat doesn't kill so that he, himself, may live. He kills for the mere joy of killing, of seeing suffering and blood. He catches a mouse, and lets it run away, and catches it again. He feels the small body quivering under his paw—quivering with fear and pain . . . he mangles it; then, at last, he kills it.

No, you probably never watched a cat kill a mouse. Because the sight would have made you ill. It would have disgusted you, principally, because the mouse never had a chance!

We don't like mice. We want them killed—mercifully. But we do, most of us, like birds, and we don't want them killed. And yet a cat kills a bird in the same way that a cat kills a mouse—for the mere joy of the killing. It is estimated that the cats in New York state alone kill three and one half million birds a year.

In an article in the New York Evening Journal Garrett P. Serviss tells some interesting facts about cats and the habits of cats. To quote directly:

Agents of the A. S. P. C. A. collecting cats. The little fellow in the upper picture did his share

HOMELESS ANIMALS.

"Some cats are more murderous than other cats, but it is alleged—and, I believe, correctly—that no cat can be cured altogether of the desire to kill. And birds are its pet victims. It is also alleged—and again, I believe, with justice—that cats are master hypocrites and the greatest of egotists. They haven't a shade of the self-sacrificing devotion of a dog.

"A cat as big and powerful as a Newfoundland dog would be a peril to children and even to grown people. It is a man's friend because it knows it is not strong enough to be his enemy. The quality of mercy is not in the cat's makeup. No animal which has an instinctive love of worrying and tormenting a weaker creature, and a crippled one at that, is capable of moral education. The way of a cat with a mouse is sufficient to awaken sympathy even for that pest of the pantry.

"As to the pretended usefulness of cats as a destroyer of rats, the Massachusetts indictment is too moderate in alleging that not more than one cat in every three ever kills a rat. It is a habit of cats to keep out of the way of rats. A rat is a mean animal, but a terrible fighter when cornered; and cats do not attack fighters. As to mice, my own experience is that a hou ca will not even try ey terminate th rather suspect tha sh likes to see them bu the house being her an preserve. If a r be ball would squea sh would as soon worry that as worry a mouse. A oo as her victim ceases to suffer she lets it alone.

"The Massachusetts ornithologist avers tha th public has no conception of the enormous num r o stray cats that roam the woods, the fields an th neighborhood houses, barns, and villages at ght We have got rid of the native wildcat, he says, l i its place we have introduced a far more destr tiv animal, coddled in our homes, and made a comp ion for our children, to whom it undoubtedly often ng unexplained disease and death."

THIS last statement by Mr. Serviss has come m to us, lately, in a very forcible way. Sin th infantile paralysis epidemic broke out the healt offi cials of New York are proving that they fear cat -fo the stray cats of the city are mostly diseased sc en gers, who haunt garbage pails and refuse piles. he carry disease to many homes, and the health o ial realize that they have helped spread the paraly s.

A few days ago I saw a little girl in o the crowded slum dis cts She held a lean, vi ous looking cat under one rm The child was thin an pal (in an ideal condition ab sorb germs), and the c had sore, inflamed eyes l mangy, dirty coat. s watched, I saw the litt gir stroke the cat's patcl fu with her small thin ha ; second later I saw her aw and rub her sleepy eye wit that same hand. I wond how many times a day othe hil dren do that same thin

"Every cat," says G rett P. Serviss, "is a murd er." The health departme o New York seems to gree with him, for it is usin vigorous methods in ca ing and disposing of stray ats. Perhaps carrying the rms of dread disease may se n an indirect way of murd ing; but it is murder jus the same! Particularly if t cat happens to be your at—and the children who play with it, your children!

THERE are in the U ited States anywhere rom 25,000,000 to 50,000,00 ats. Many of these are stra ats. Some of them are arly-loved pets. But all of em, at times, are dangerous And every city and town ould take care of them as New York is beginning to.

If you have pet cats, keep them as clean as po ble, and see that your children fondle them very se om. Do not let your children pick up stray cats an play with them. Remember that they may carry inf ion, and contagion, and death.

Uncle Sam, Arctic Farmer

By FRANK G. CARPENTE

Irish Cobbler potatoes grown under the Arctic Circle

I WANT to show you how Uncle Sam is tilling the soil under the shadow of the North Pole. The old patriarch has established an experiment farm at Rampart, Alaska, on the Yukon, within less than a degree of the Arctic Circle, where he is testing the short-summer crops necessary to develop Alaska. He is raising barley, oats and winter rye, and is experimenting with wheat, hardy clover and even alfalfa. He has ransacked the frigid zone, and his agents are even now in northern China, on the desert of Gobi, and on the highlands of the Pamir, looking for seeds. He is getting samples of grains from Abyssinia and the Atlas Mountains in Africa, and has no end of plants now growing here that have come from Finland and Norway, as well as from the northernmost part of the United States and Canada.

As it is, he has been able to mature in one season more than fifty varieties of different grains, and these include spring barleys and oats, spring rye and wheat, and also winter rye and winter wheat. He is raising potatoes, cabbages and other vegetables, and has begun to experiment with strawberries with such success that he has produced a handful this year.

But let me show you where Rampart is on the earth, and how its conditions compare with those of other cold farmlands of the globe. If you will take your map of Alaska, you will see that it is about one-third of the way south from the international boundary, about half way between Fairbanks and the Arctic Circle, and is in the heart of the Yukon-Tanana agricultural district, the lower part of which will be thrown open by Uncle Sam's new railroad, now building to Fairbanks. That part is in the lowlands of the Tanana Valley. This is in the rolling hills that border the Yukon.

The latitude of Rampart is just about 65 degrees north. If you should run your finger around the globe on that line it would pass through parts of Siberia, Russia, Finland and Scandinavia, cutting large regions which are producing quantities of rye, barley anc ats, and exporting live stock and butter and cheese.

Take, for instance, Finland, which is just out one-fourth the size of Alaska. According t the figures of our agricultural experts, it has 7,0 000 acres under cultivation, comprising 271,000 farm Its annual crops amount in round numbers to som ing like 20,000,000 bushels of oats, 12,000,000 bush s of rye, 5,000,000 bushels of barley and 19,0 000 bushels of potatoes. It produces 7,000,000 or 00,-000 bushels of turnips and about 3,000,000 pou s of flax and hemp. That country has now more han 1,000,000 cows, and it ships 36,000,000 pounds o butter a year. Its population is more than 3,000,00 and of these 85 per cent. live on the farm.

There are parts of Siberia that lie in the sam ati-tude as the valley of the Yukon. Among these the cultivated Valley of the Amur, that produces m ons of bushels of oats, and has hundreds of thousa s of horses, cattle and hogs.

The agricultural experts from whose reports ese figures are taken state that their lowest estimate the available farming lands in the Yukon-Tanana ion is 4,500,000 acres, and in this they do not incl as much as 25 per cent. of the uplands lying no of the Tanana River. They do not in this est ato take in the vast area of the Yukon flats, where they say that farming is possible, and they omit about 50 per cent. of the 7,000 square miles of the lower Tanana bottoms.

At every stop on my way down the Yukon I have seen small patches of cultivated land. Every log cabin has its garden and nearly every miner his patch of potatoes. Just outside Eagle I photographed a field of sixteen acres of oats which is now in head. It will be cut for oats-hay and will have a feeding value of $100 and upward per ton.

The government experiment station is just across the river from Rampart. The farm lies on rolling grounds that slope gently up from the river, and the home of the farmer, Mr. G. W. Gasser, is a pretty one-story cottage with a glass porch at the front. Below the house is a sloping garden, and behind it and at the right and left are something like forty acres of experiment crops.

We landed on the bank of the Yukon and walked through the farm, a distance of a quarter of a mile, to the house. The land on the right of the road was intensively cultivated, while that on the left was as nature made it. The latter was covered with moss and muck, and I doubt not the glacial ice exists within two feet of its surface. A little farther back were trees and bushes. On the right near the river we passed a field of barley, the grain of some parts of which was fully six feet in height.

Passing the barley, we came to a field of oats. This was patchy, and Mr. Gasser told me that the ground had been cleared only last year and that crops do not do well until the second season.

Our next sight was a field of potatoes covering five or six acres. They were in full bloom, the vines reaching to the height of my knees. Each row had a label marking its variety and Mr. Gasser told me that new varieties are tried every year. The six best now known are Extra Early Eureka, Pioneer, Early Triumph and Early Ohio, Gold Coin and Irish Cobbler.

The potatoes are often started in greenhouses or cold frames. About four weeks before planting they are put in trays, slightly covered with soil. Sprouts come out to the length of from a half inch to three inches. They are so set that the longest just reach the surface. So sprouted, the potatoes start with a rush, and they make more than double the growth and yield of potatoes planted in the ordinary way. An experiment was made with sixty-five hills of each kind. The sprouted hills had a yield of 280 pounds, while the unsprouted ones produced only 166 pounds. Potatoes are also sprouted by being placed in the attic or in any warm room.

The season is so short here that many vegetables are started in hotbeds. This is so with cabbages and cauliflower. Peas are set out in the open, and they mature so well that the farm raises much of its own food. Lettuce and radishes also are grown with success.

As to seasons, the warm weather lasts less than three months. In fact, the number of days between frosts are only eighty or ninety. Frost is liable to occur as late as June 1, and there are killing frosts as early as the first week in September. Mr. Gasser has kept a table of the freezing dates for five years, and this shows that there were on the average about ninety-five days between the late spring and early fall frosts. Such frosts affect potatoes and buckwheat, but do not injure the hardier grains. As to winter, the thermometer occasionally goes down to 60, 70 and even more degrees below zero, but it is the cold of the summer only that affects the crops.

The work of this experiment station is not like that of an ordinary farm. The crops are not raised to be sold, although enough is produced to feed the stock. Its business is to test grains and plants and to find those best adapted to the country. It does a great deal of cross-breeding and produces new grains and new plants, and especially legumes that will benefit the soil.

During my stay I have looked over the crops now growing. They come from all parts of the world. I was especially interested in the various kinds of alfalfa. Mr. Gasser has now in the ground a yellow-flowered alfalfa that has been imported from Siberia. It grows wild there, and it promises to do very well along the Yukon. The plants shown me are about two feet in height and they have bright yellow flowers. They differ from the common alfalfa in that they have smaller leaves and their stems are more slender and more diffuse. This variety has never been winter-killed at this station. Mr. Gasser is now crossing it with the Grimm alfalfa, which is almost as hardy. Alfalfa is not cultivated so far north as this anywhere else upon earth.

As we looked at the alfalfa, I asked Mr. Gasser whether the soil was deep enough for the crop. In the United States our alfalfa roots sometimes go down many feet. Here they would be stopped by the glacial ice-bed, which is less than a yard from the surface.

"They stop at the ice," was the reply, "and the ends of the roots freeze off. However, the roots spread out above this, and by cultivation the ground thaws deeper and deeper."

I asked Mr. Gasser if he thought farming could be carried on successfully in Alaska. He replied:

"Yes, but at first the farming possibilities will be determined by the demands of the local market, and these are very limited. Later some things may be raised for export. Our potatoes are excellent and our vegetables more palatable than any grown in the states. The quick growth of the short hot summer makes them sweeter and juicier. Our turnips surpass any grown farther south, and we expect that some day all the turnip seed of the United States will be raised in Alaska. We can grow lettuce, beets, beans, peas and carrots, and I believe we shall be able to raise many kinds of berries. I have just gathered my first strawberry crop. It came from that patch." And here the farmer pointed to a half dozen strawberry vines. There were a few berries on them, and the prospect for anything like a strawberry crop looked thin. Mr. Gasser signaled the house and a man brought out the strawberry crop. It consisted of a dozen red berries half filling a teacup. One of the ladies of our party picked up a berry and was about to sample it when the farmer gently took it out of her hand and told her that he wished to make a photograph of the crop for the Agricultural Department. His plants have now gone through two winters, and this small yield is considered a triumph, as there is no record of strawberries having been grown so far north before.

Mr. Gasser's remarks as to the local market of Alaska should be kept in mind by all who think of coming to the territory to engage in farming. The prices of all things here are high, but the demand is so limited that an influx of settlers would soon bring them below the cost of production. There are in this whole territory, including the Indians, less than 100,000 people, and they are scattered over a country one-fifth as large as the whole United States.

The comparisons of Alaska with Norway, Sweden and Finland do not take into consideration the enormous population on the other side of the Baltic Sea and their nearness to the British Isles. Siberia has large areas of wheat-growing territory, and wheat will bear exportation. It has thousands who are engaged in dairying and there are solid butter trains, which, in times of peace, carry butter and cheese across Russia to the ports of the Baltic, whence they are shipped on to England. As long as we have such vast areas of dairy lands in the States it will be unnecessary to develop a dairy industry here except for the local market. As it is now, the dairy markets of Alaska are supplied from cans. Condensed milk and condensed cream are served everywhere, and, strange to say, some people like the condensed milk better than that from the cow. Indeed, I have heard men who have acquired the canned cream and canned fruit taste say they intend to stick to it in preference to the real article. They make me think of the newsboy who, during his fresh-air week in the country, refused to eat the new-laid egg. When asked why he replied: "I don't like 'em. They ain't got no taste and there ain't no smell."

Give us a Great President for a Great Crisis

THESE are days that demand true greatness at Washington. And for the critical days that are to come after the war, we shall more than ever have need of a great executive.

Charles E. Hughes is the man.

His record as a great Governor of New York State proves it.

This is his record in brief:

When the gas investigation began in New York City, Hughes, unknown to the public and unheard of in politics, was the one great lawyer whose freedom from corporation entanglements made it possible for him to perform brilliant service for the people.

In the insurance investigation, by sheer intellectual power he mastered intricate technicalities, fought his way through the confusing defenses of experts and almost single-handed, brought the gigantic insurance companies to justice and reform.

Public admiration of his fearlessness as an investigator brought him the Republican nomination for Mayor of New York which he instantly waved aside because it might impair his uncompleted insurance work.

Elected Governor, he put new life into every branch of government, and brought into office a great group of the strongest and most expert administrators that had ever served the State.

When he dared to attack race-track gambling, he risked his whole political future in an enterprise which his political advisers told him was hopeless. He won. Race-track gambling was suppressed. He was re-elected.

He battled with the bosses for direct primaries, ballot reform and the short ballot.

He devised and created the great public service commissions which took the railroads out of politics and drove the "Black Horse Cavalry" out of Albany. His idea of public service control has since been followed by many other States.

He advocated and helped to bring about the enactment of a Workmen's Compensation Law—the first of its type in the Union.

This law has been the basis for subsequent legislation in New York and other States.

He did not fear popular clamor. His veto of the unsound but popular 2c.-a-mile railroad rate bill shows that.

Finally, he never made a deal. He never traded appointments for measures.

He appointed men to office for merit only. He never removed a man from office for political or personal reasons. Had he stooped even occasionally to the use of patronage to reward friends and to punish enemies, his victories would have been quick and easy — but he never stooped. He could have easily undermined the power of his political arch-enemy by a single threat to the unprotected State Capitol employees, yet every workman who did his duty remained secure in his job. He never appointed a Republican because he was "deserving" in Bryan's sense of the word.

Politicians of both parties sneered, fought, called him "cold," "impractical" and "theorist," and succumbed to him. Here was a new type of man. They did not understand him. Apparently the people did, for they trusted him.

Thus did the magic name of Hughes become a name to conjure with in New York State politics for years thereafter. To say a man was a "Hughes man" has had a special meaning in New York State; to say that a measure was favored by Hughes has given it at once a standing that nothing else could. Democrats, Progressives and Republicans have used the name of Hughes to win support for men and measures.

Today, Hughes is saying:

"I propose that every man I put in charge of an important department shall be a man eminently fit to discharge the duties of that department."

"I don't care, if I'm elected President, what becomes of my personal political fortunes."

This is the same Hughes who made his performances tally with his promises when he was Governor of New York State. Can there be any doubt that he will do likewise when he becomes President of the United States?

An Important Announcement

In Which the Publisher Takes the Christian Herald Family int Confidence Regarding the Problem of Increased Cost

THESE are troublous days, troublous not only for those abroad, but for those at home. What with nearly all of Europe engaged in war, Mexico in a state of unrest, the Far East seething with apprehension for what may happen to it before its aforetime civilized protectors can settle their immediate quarrels and give it some assurance of security, is it any wonder that the general condition has affected, directly or indirectly, the life of every man, woman and child in these United States? Some of you may think that you are not affected, but you are, whether it be in your sympathies or in the rising cost of the commodities which you must use in your every-day life.

It has affected the Christian Herald in common with other publications to such an extent that very radical steps must be taken to conserve the interests of the publication. For instance, the increase in wages during the past twelve months has been $16,380; the cost of electrotyping the Christian Herald has increased this year by $13,661.77; the cost of printing the Christian Herald has increased $29,531.11. Extensive as these increases have been, however, they are as nothing compared to what threatens. During the past year and a half the price of paper has nearly doubled, and it is feared by many publishers that the price will treble before very long. To show you what this means, let us state that the paper used in printing the Christian Herald cost us $200,000 last year. If the price is doubled, it will naturally cost us $400,000. If it is trebled, as has been practically threatened, the cost will be far over half a million.

For over thirty years the Christian Herald has been sold for $1.50 a year, and were it not for the breaking out of the European War it would have continued to be sold for $1.50 a year for thirty years or twice thirty years to come. True, it had cost us more to make and mail the Christian Herald than the subscription price amounted to; that is to say, the cost of printing and mailing the publication and the wages and material connected with this have been actually more than $1.50 per copy even before the pres creases in cost developed. Wer for the advertisements which ha carried the present Christian could not have been published But now, due to the European W all its attending issues, there ha tremendous increases in the material, increases in the cost and paper and ink, all of which y verify by asking the publisher local newspaper, who probab troubles enough of his own in t at this time. But to return Christian Herald.

What are we to do? It is obvi we must make up the difference way or else go out of busines know of only one way. Unless to sell the Christian Herald at we must ask a higher price fo has been suggested that we dou subscription price of the C Herald; but, of course, we wo do that. We shall have to adv an appreciable amount and more than, with the help of ou tisements, will allow us to pu and at least come out even. figure it now, this advanced pr be $2, which we shall be comp put into practice on November 2 It may be that two dollars will enough to save the situation. case, we shall have to raise th again; but we shall not cro bridge until we come to it.

Meantime, we ask the cooper all our friends. The making statement is one of the most un tasks we have had to underta long, long while. It does not fitting way to reward the coo of thousands of friends wh worked with us, shoulder to s so many years. But what else do? All present members of th tian Herald Family will be gi opportunity to subscribe at the rate of $1.50 for the year 1917, subscribers will also be accepte price; but all orders at this pr be received before November 2 then the price will be $2 per an

Y. M. C. A. Mobilized for Border Ser ice

THE Army and Navy Department of the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations is carrying out comprehensive plans for work among the troops on the border.

At least twenty-five fully equipped Association branches are to be established at camps where there are brigades or single regiments of troops. Plans are to be developed later for battalion branches and branches among even smaller units, Up to July 14, thirty-eight secretaries had been sent to the border, and several Association buildings have already been opened. More than one hundred secretaries will be employed altogether, and experienced Association men are being hurried to the border as rapidly as they can be obtained.

The outfit for an Association branch comprises a frame building of simple construction, in charge of a secretary and assistants. It is the business of the secretaries to make the Association building a social headquarters for the men and a cheer-up spot in the monotony of camp life. The eq consists of tables, chairs, bench free writing materials, books, ma newspapers from the home tow troops, a graphophone with reco generally a motion-picture Games are provided also, such checkers and dominoes, and a feature of every branch is the barrel. Included always in th ment is a folding organ for services. Entertainments, lect concerts are part of the prog well as outdoor games.

The religious feature will be for by a series of Gospel meeting Bible classes. he Things Which Are Not Seen

nternational Sunday School Lesson for September 24
Review of the Quarter's Lesson

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"Things which are not seen." II Cor. 4 : 18

fe's greatest things are not seen. We m see the thoughtful and tender gifts ar sacrifices that love makes, but not the lo that makes them; the holy life which th race of God creates, but not the grace lts; the uprooting and pilgrimage of fa, but not Sarah nor Isaac, nor A ham's most intimate associates could se he unseen motive-energy of his faith. T little child that grasps a new toy with bo its chubby hands in an ecstasy of co ntment will have to wait for long ye before it will comprehend the heart of ve that thought, and planned, and pu hased, and gave. The soul that lives on in the seen misses the best half of its lif Unlike the hibernating animals, it sl s in its dark cell through the gladness of e summer, and creeps out when winter comes with its short dark days; or it is content with brackish surface pools and misses the crystal springs. We have sometimes seen a sailing vessel making headway against a strong current, because the unseen wind, moving contrary to the current, has filled its sails and borne it forward. If you would live happily, keep your sails unfurled to the Spirit of God, whom no man hath seen or can see. Strike into the Eternal. Take true measure of your eternal treasure. Summon the unseen, perfect and eternal, to counterbalance the imperfection and transience of the seen. Look beyond the printed page to the divine thought. Believe in the ideal behind the real, the spiritual behind the material, the blessed home of God's rest which is unaffected by these light afflictions.

he Middle Period of Paul's Career

B George D. Allison, D.D., Ph.D.

Ne last quarter we had the story the conversion of Saul and the s ps by which the Christian Church is l to embark upon its world-wide iss n through the vision of Peter and e secrated zeal of the missionaries A och. The quarter which we now tie has covered very sketchily the idd period of Paul's career, which clu s the latter half of the second iss ary journey (from the time he os over into Europe) and the third iss ary journey, ending at Jerusa-n. This period presents to us Paul e tured Christian and experienced an listic campaigner, and it also re s the first group of his letters. e ve studied together a series of pic experiences of the great mis-ma. We have also studied a series of pic exhortations from those letters ie were written from the midst of es busy affairs.

Intimate View of Paul's Character

FM the account of a close friend d fellow worker, supplemented by n letters, we can usually gain a rl ccurate idea of a man's personal-. his has been our real aim in the st ree months. As a character ad and as a historical investigation, u remind ourselves that the lessons ve een from the "we" portions of e ok of Acts, where Luke was an ew ess of the events and also talked er aul's work almost daily with the d himself. Any one who tries to er ow the historic accuracy of such d ument as Acts has picked out a ek rag to undermine. It is what a ur would hold primary evidence. ha then are some of Paul's salient ar eristics from Luke's point of ew

Le n One (Thessalonica, Berea). ul he Master of the Word. Here s the man of Tarsus laboring with lli and with caviling hearers to nd te the claims of Christ by the ri res, an intelligent workman ght dividing the word of truth, a od ldier expert with the sword of the piri which is the Word of God.

Le n Three (Athens). Paul the rs le and Adaptable. How tact-lly e approaches his changed audi-ce om a new point of view, philo-ph lly and by illustrations within eir nge of thought and experience! mo all the shrines he found an altar at ve him his text to speak of God t God of nature, the universal th and the Guardian of that moral w ich is binding on all the race alike.

Le n Four (Corinth). Paul the rs ent. How he exhausts every ea of "winning some"—going to the w nd to the Greeks, working in the na gue, the tent factory and the ous of Titus Justus. Arrested and ra ed, he spends more than a year ld half in setting up a permanent center of light and leading in the most licentious and worldly of cities.

Lesson Eight (Ephesus). Paul the Successful Reformer. Here is a minister who preached so effectively that $50,000 worth of superstitious books were burned up by the converts who had received the Holy Spirit under his ministry. Yes, working so mighty a change month by month that the sale of idolatrous articles in a pagan city fell off alarmingly and business men persecuted him for hurting their business.

Lessons Nine, Eleven, Twelve (Miletus, Jerusalem). Paul the Fearless. He disregards the warnings of coming suffering though divinely authentic, and with matchless courage faces the temple authorities and the Jewish mob.

No wonder this man towers head and shoulders above his contemporaries in the imagination of Christian thinkers. Persistent, fearless, Scriptural, and victorious, he stands forth as the ideal Christian worker—great in soul, great in the mastery of circumstances, great in spiritual vision and insight. If you are a Sunday school teacher one of your genuine responsibilities this year is to make St. Paul a vital, real, compelling figure to the minds of the young Christians under your care.

II. Some Striking Features of Paul's Teaching

JUST as those lessons which narrate Paul's adventures show the character of the true apostle, so also do these other passages taken from his letters reveal the saint indeed.

Lesson Two (I Thessalonians). The Life of Faith. Paul exhorts the Thessalonians, already thorough converts, to be faithful regarding the essence of the Christian experience that it is a life of faith. Therefore he reminds them that he prays believingly for their steadfastness, and that they too must be instant in prayer. Then he takes up their greatest trial of faith—the death of many of their number. He assures them of the certainty of the resurrection and of a share in eternal life for every faithful believer.

Lesson Five (I Corinthians). Humility with Power in It. This is Paul's great exhortation for simple trust in the crucified Redeemer. He was able to say sincerely that he had determined to bow humbly before the great fact of the atonement and bring every interest of life to the test of the sacrificial Christ. He in himself could do nothing. We can do nothing without God. But such humility has power behind it. This is not unworthy self-depreciation, but real manly dependence upon the rightful master of the soul.

Lesson Six (I Corinthians). Love the Supreme Gift of the Spirit. The apostle of faith acknowledges the superiority of love. In the 13th of I Corinthians, Paul stands by the side of John the Beloved. Apart from Christian love all forms of worship are empty ceremonialism, all deeds of charity lose their fragrance. There are diversities of gifts, varieties of talent; But there is only one spirit

The Mitchell Sedan, Springfield Type—Seats for Seven

Winter Cars

For Use the Year Around

The Springfield Type of body has attained enormous vogue. In storm or cold an enclosed Sedan. But the plate-glass sides disappear in a moment, and you have an open Touring Car.

The Cabriolet is a coupe whose windows drop into the doors. The top falls back and you have a three-passenger Roadster.

The Limousine, as designed for the Mitchell, has all windows made to drop. So it serves in any weather.

The Mitchell Coupe has this same useful feature.

These are types to be well-considered when you choose a car. The evidence is that one car for all weathers is the coming idea in bodies.

No Attractions Missing

In the Mitchell closed bodies no dainty touch is missing. The designers first examined all the finest bodies built. They noted every idea men had thought of to add luxury to these cars.

There are numerous ideas all our own, so the Mitchells are distinctive. But you will not find in the costliest cars, we think, one attraction we have overlooked.

All On Bate-Built Cars

But the great fact is that these luxury bodies all come on Bate-built cars. They come on a chassis which John W. Bate has spent 13 years in perfecting. They come from a factory which he designed and equipped to build these cars at the minimum cost.

They have our 26 extra features—things which other cars omit. All are paid for by factory savings.

They have 440 parts which are drop-forged or steel-stamped. They have a wealth of Chrome-Vanadium steel. They have the strength which fits them for life-time service. Two of these cars have already run more than 200,000 miles each—full forty years of ordinary service.

When you realize what efficiency means in car-building, the Mitchell will be your choice. It means at least 20 per cent. greater value than you find in other cars in this class. It means standards and features which you will not go without. Now you who want the finest bodies can get them on this car.

able to energize and give value to all—that which we have learned to call Christian love.

Lesson Seven (II Corinthians). Christian Giving. There is no love without giving. Even God "so loved" that "he gave." Love is to service exactly what faith is to works. There can be gifts without love, alas, but they are as mechanical and spiritually ineffective as works without faith. God's love is in cheerful giving. The unseen and eternal factor is demonstrated by the temporal and visible gift or service. The grace of giving is so central that the dividing line between the worldling and the Christian may be stated thus: one lives to get, the other to give. And Paul treasured up for us that saying of Jesus that no one else records: "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Any one who cannot understand that is still walking in darkness.

Lesson Ten (II Corinthians). The Sacrificial Life. It costs something to be a Christian. "If any man would be my disciple, let him take up his cross and follow me." There must be suffering in a full-orbed Christian experience. This is strange but true. It may be physical suffering or spiritual, but the noblest character is never produced without it. Paul's catalogue of his own sufferings, forced from his modest heart by false accusations of self-interest, reveals a daily martyrdom and a variety of pains, anxieties, and trials. Yet it is not the mere weight of the inflictions themselves that make character. Not so at all, but the spirit in which they are endured and surmounted. It is not because our opportunities of sacrifice are fewer and our sorrows lighter, but rather because our souls are craven and complaining that we do not grow. Some foolish people in all ages have sought trouble, have flogged their bodies and tormented their souls, thinking to win the great rewards. But suffering is not good for its own sake. By bearing our necessary burdens and conquering our inevitable temptations and seeking not our own pleasure, we too shall grow in grace, if Christ is in all our thoughts, if his grace is sufficient for us, if we, like the Lord himself, learn obedience by the things we suffer.

III. Secrets of Christianity's Success

NO wonder Christianity spread with life and doctrine like this. But there was only one Paul, says some one. True. Yet there were hundreds, yes, thousands, of the same spirit and temper—though of fewer talents or opportunities. We read of the very traveling pedlers who dispensed the grace of God with all their wares. We hear of notable saints among the longshoremen of the Corinthian waterfront. We find in the Epistle to Diognetus the same practical emphasis on godly living, and also an exclamation that may well have sprung from many a heathen heart: "Behold how these Christians love one another!" From Paul's own letters which you have you can draw up a wonderful list of disciples approved by him. Jesus, indeed, brought the new spirit and attitude into human affairs, but it had to be incarnated into countless lives by such fidelity as Paul's, by such acceptance as Timothy's, before the lump began to be leavened. Christianity has not failed today, nor the principles of Jesus lost their power. But in many quarters Christians have failed. If the salt hath lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted? Ye are the light of the world. Let your light so shine before men that they shall see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven.

The Things Which Are Unseen

LAST of all let us notice that these great world-changing forces are soul-forces. Who cares how much money Paul ever had? He had unseen treasures inexhaustible. Who thinks much of Nero's temporal power, his soldiers, his palaces, compared with this captain of the Lord's host? What avails the transitory fame of Cæsar and of Titus as military conquerors by contrast with the world's debt to this spiritual victor, then so obscure? Money, power, fame, or the gifts of the Holy Spirit; which seek we?

With us today is the curse of the temporary, the lure of things. The desirabilities comprise automobiles, houses, clothes, rich foods, vivid pleasures. We are all of us in danger of living on the surface of life and of missing its deepest meanings. How much we need today's text, a golden text indeed: "We look not at the things which are seen but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

Young People's Topics for September 24

The Sunday School and Missions

B. Y. P. U. Topic (Conquest Meeting).
Ps. 100 : 1-5

CONQUEST is a very military word, but there are conquests that are not military and that endure when the trophies of war have faded. Military conquest has a tendency to recoil upon the conqueror, but conquest in the name of Christ and in the power of his name is permanent. Carey in India and Paton in the South Seas and Livingstone in Africa won kingdoms for their Lord in the hearts of men, and these kingdoms grow and spread with the years. There are kingdoms to be won, too, here at home. Billy Sunday has won many a conquest, and there are other men, and women, too, whose spirit-blessed labor has turned dens of sin into abodes of righteousness. The arm of the Lord is not weakened, nor does he depend for his conquests upon Careys or Livingstones or Sundays; every young people's society and every member may be a conqueror for God. What are the requirements! Read the Psalm. First: "Make a joyful noise unto the Lord." There are spiritual Jerichos innumerable that will yield to the shout of praise today. Next: "Serve the Lord with gladness! Come before his presence with singing." Victorious armies win forward with songs on their lips. Then: "Know ye that the Lord, he is God"; and know, too, that "we are his people and the sheep of his pasture." Assurance is necessary to conquest. We are to "enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise." . . . "For the Lord is good;

Everyday Contrasts

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

ISABEL, who lives on the upper West Side, perilously near Fifth Avenue, called on me at my office a few days ago. Her maid, dressed in a black cape and bonnet, came with her: for Isabel is just eleven and never goes out on the streets alone. As she sat in one of my high office chairs with hands primly folded I cast about in my mind for something to say to her.

"I suppose you'll be going back to school soon?" I questioned at last, by way of breaking the ice.

Isabel's rosy little face broke into smiles.

"Oh, no, indeed!" she answered. "School won't open until late this year. They're afraid, even in the private school [illegible], of the epidemic. I'm so glad that I won't have to go back right away. I hate school! I hate to study!"

Shortly after Isabel left me, Yetta of the East Side dropped in. Yetta is just about Isabel's age, and she lives—has always lived—in a tenement on one of our most congested city streets. She greeted me effusively and perched herself on the arm of my biggest chair.

"I suppose," I ventured, when at last I got a chance to speak, "I suppose you're mighty glad, Yetta, about school?"

"About school—what?" answered Yetta quickly.

"About school opening late, on account of the infantile paralysis!" I answered.

The child's face fell. Even her tight-braided pigtails seemed to quiver with grief.

"Don't talk about it," said Yetta sadly. "I feel awful bad about it."

"But why?" I questioned. "I thought all little girls liked a vacation. I did."

Yetta eyed me soberly. Then she spoke.

"It's lonesome without school," said Yetta. "I love school!"

ONCE, when I was a little, little girl, I owned a plaid dress that I hated with one of the fierce, unreasoning hates of childhood. It was a serviceable, warm dress, but the colors were too brilliant, and the style was too flouncy, and perhaps I realized it in my little girl way. I had been brought up to wear the clothing that was given to me, and so I wore the dress without protest; but I was unhappy while I was arrayed in its flaunting red-and-greenness.

One day I wore the hated dress to school, and even though I was uncomfortably aware of its brightness, I was grateful for the warmth it gave me, for it was a cold day. As I stood in the cloak-room taking off my heavy little [illegible], I noticed one of my classmates eyeing me wistfully. She was a small girl with a thin face and big eyes, and she never looked properly clothed. Her mother was a widow who took in washing and even buying the food they ate was a struggle for them, sometimes. As I passed her on the way out of the cloak-room she reached toward me with a slender hand and touched the too full ruffles of my skirt.

"What a pretty, pretty dress!" she murmured. "Oh, what a sweet dress! How I'd love to have one just like it!"

I stared at her in surprise. It had not occurred to me before that any one could see anything worth while in the dress. And as I looked at her a thought took root in my little girl brain.

"Why," I reasoned to myself, "there's nothing in the world that somebody doesn't like; nothing in the world, no matter how you hate it, that somebody wouldn't be glad to have!"

That night I told the story from the beginning, to my mother. I told her how I had hated the dress—and how the little poor girl loved it. And the next time our washing went out to the child's mother a vivid plaid frock was on the top of the basket, with a tiny note pinned to it.

And the little girl wore it to school gladly—so gladly that every time I saw her in it I learned my lesson over again.

I KNEW a boy who was a sophomore in college. He had been away from home just long enough to realize that the little house he came from was not very pretentious. He had visited other boys who had numerous servants and Paris-gowned mothers, and fathers who always wore evening clothes to dinner. And he began to be ashamed of the home where his mother sat, in a neat print frock, darning stockings; and where his father, dressed in blue overalls, fussed over the kitchen garden.

This boy made friends with a rich student who belonged to the same fraternity. Folk called the rich student's father "the cotton king," and his mother's picture appeared very often on the society pages of certain daily papers. The boy had visited at the great mansion that they called home, and had enjoyed every kind of luxury. The luxuries made him look down, even more, upon his own home. And then, suddenly, at the beginning of the Easter holidays, the rich student walked into the boy's room, and said: "Say, Dick, the mater's giving a big party this week—and I'm tired of big parties. Can't I go home with you?"

And the boy, groaning inwardly, said as cheerfully as he could: "Why, certainly, old man. I'd be glad to have you. But," he added doubtfully, "you'll find our home very simple—very different from yours!"

The rich student laughed. "I'll like it that way," he answered. "You're all right, you are, to let me come."

There was nothing to do but take him home. The boy realized that. For he was under an obligation. So he wrote to his mother and said,

"For goodness' sake, have everything as nice as you can! I'm bringing a very rich friend to spend my vacation with me."

And the mother was delighted, for, she said, "Dickie has brought home so few of his friends." She didn't realize why.

So Dick came home with his rich friend. And the father, in overalls, met them at the station with a buggy. And the rich friend drove home sitting on a soap-box, for the buggy was small. And he laughed and said it was fun, but the boy was strangely silent. And the mother, in her freshest print dress, met them at the gate and kissed them both, "For," she said, "I know I'll love any of my son's friends!"

And the rich man's son thought of his coldly formal home, and he kissed her while he winked, just a bit, because there was something in his eyes that bothered him. But Dick dragged him away worriedly, and led him to the guest chamber.

And then they had supper in the cool dining-room, and there was home-made strawberry jam to eat, and hot biscuits. And as the rich student was eating his seventh biscuit he turned suddenly to the boy. "You're lucky, Dick," he said gruffly. "You don't know how lucky you are!" And then Dick understood, just as I had understood about the dress. And he realized that his friend envied him. And he wasn't ashamed of his home any more.

THERE'S nothing in the world, no matter how scornful we are of it, that somebody wouldn't enjoy. Maybe it's school, or a dress, or a home. Maybe it's a family or friends or love. When you find yourself ashamed of something or disliking something, just look at it in that way. When you, the ones of you who are schoolgirls, find yourselves hating your lessons, think of the girls who would give anything to go to school. If your clothes aren't fine enough, remember how wonderful they would seem to some little factory drudge. If your home seems dull and commonplace, think of the people who live in a home without love; think of the people who haven't any home at all! And when you get thinking along these lines, somehow you generally begin to feel a bit thankful yourself for the things that other people would enjoy.

To Crown the Breakfast Table

There are three royal cereals—Puffed Wheat, Puffed Rice and Corn Puffs—made to crown your breakfast table.

However you regard them—as foods or as dainties—nothing else made from these grains can compare with them.

As fascinating foods—as hygienic foods—they represent the pinnacle of what these grains can offer.

Tit-Bits Shot From Guns

Puffed Grains seem like bonbons. They are airy, flaky bubbles with a most enticing taste.

But Puffed Wheat and Rice are whole grains with every food cell exploded. By Prof. Anderson's process they are made so that every atom feeds.

The grains are sealed in guns. They are given terrific heat. All the moisture in them is changed to steam. Then the guns are shot, and the steam explodes. There occur in each kernel a hundred million explosions.

The result is, whole grains made wholly digestible. Every element is made available. No other method of cooking these grains breaks more than half of the food cells.

That is why Puffed Grains, with folks who know, form such a large part of the diet.

Puffed Wheat 12c
Puffed Rice 15c
Except in Far West
Corn Puffs—Bubbles of Corn Hearts—15c

At Bedtime

At breakfast, of course, you serve with sugar and cream. Or mixed with any fruit. But for luncheons or suppers serve in bowls of milk or cream. Use in place of bread and crackers.

Then you have whole grains, toasted and flaky, ready to melt in the mouth. You have foods which don't tax the stomach. And you know that every element feeds.

A home misses much which doesn't keep all three of these foods on hand.

"And so this Bible Correspondence Course is strengthening the impression that Bible study is at once the most fascinating and most important of all studies. Since it is, I must increasingly give it the first place in my life, and adjust other reading and study to suit."

You will become just as enthusiastic as soon as you start your first course. We cannot urge too strongly all who wish a more thorough knowledge of God's Word to take up the work with us this season.

The Moody Bible Institute has a fully equipped department exclusively devoted to teaching by correspondence.

Our aim is for careful business administration, most efficient teaching, and courteous attention to all inquirers and students.

Our courses are thoroughly tested and increasingly popular. Notwithstanding the world war which has affected our work in many parts of the world, the absorption of the people in the prosperous business conditions in our country, and the opposition of destructive criticism, large gains were made last year over any previous year. Our courses will satisfy your needs.

We Offer These Eight Courses

Synthetic Bible Study
—a fascinating study of the contents of the whole Bible, "really in a class by itself."

Practical Christian Work
—for soul winners and workers in exceptional forms of Christian service.

Bible Doctrine
—a biblical course in the great doctrines of the Christian faith.

Bible Chapter Summary
—a unique method of becoming acquainted with every chapter in the Bible.

Introductory Bible Course
—true to its name.

Evangelism
—nothing in modern evangelism overlooked.

Christian Evidences
—an old subject brought up to date.

THE SCOFIELD BIBLE CORRESPONDENCE COURSE
—scholarly, comprehensive, tested for a quarter of a century, and taken already by ten thousand students, is still presented as the most comprehensive course in Bible study ever offered by correspondence.

Lutherans in Convention

THE English District of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, which includes practically all the strictly English-speaking churches of the largest and most conservative Lutheran church body in America, met recently in Trinity Lutheran Church, in Pittsburg, Pa. Rev. J. A. Detzer, of Detroit, Mich., president of the district, opened the first session with a stirring address, sounding the keynote of the Synod's duty and responsibility. The founding of the Church of Christ on earth. he declared, has but one object, one duty, namely: to proclaim the Gospel.' This, and this alone, should be the entire, exclusive and unchanged purpose and business of the church.

Mr. Edmund Seuel, the general treasurer of the Missouri Synod, stated that, in spite of the increased cost of paper and other material, the Synod's business during 1915 was over $500,000, and it turned over to the synodical treasury more than $100,000 in profits.

Ten pastors and one teacher were received into the membership of Synod.

Five congregations were received: Christ Church, Webster Grove, Mo.; Trinity, Ardmore, Ill.; Pilgrim Church, Cleveland, Ohio; Trinity, Swissvale, Pa.; Christ Church, San Francisco, Calif. Grace Church of Los Angeles, Calif., applied for membership, its application being referred to the mission board.

Nine new mission stations were opened at the following places: Cleveland, Ohio, Unity Church; Fort Lee, N. J.; Palisades Park, N. J.; West New York, N. J.; Swissvale, Pa.; Grand Rapids, Mich.; Cleveland, Ohio, Mount Olive Church; Detroit, Mich., Warren Avenue Mission. About $10,000 per year will be necessary to support these and the older mission stations.

The synodical statistician reported a six and one-half per cent. increase in communicants in the district for 1915. The Synod elected as delegates to the Synodical Conference to be held in August in Toledo, Ohio, the following: Professor H. B. Hemmeter, of Conover, N. C.; Pastor Wm. Dallmann, of Milwaukee, Wis.; and lay delegates from St. Mark's Church, Detroit, Mich., and from Redeemer Church, Cleveland, Ohio. A uniform pension system for indigent pastors, pastors' widows and orphans, embodying the best features of social and secular organization, is to be worked out and presented to the Synod at large for adoption.

The English District resolved to cooperate with the Synod at large in celebrating the four-hundredth anniversary of the Reformation in 1917. In order to get the celebration properly started, it is planned to have lectures, sermons, and literature bearing on the Reformation disseminated through the length and breadth of the country. The campaign of education is to culminate on October 31 of next year in great mass meetings in all the communities covered by the Synod. Newspapers, stereopticon slides and the lyceum platform are to be used to acquaint the American people with the American principles of the Lutheran Church. A jubilee fund of one million dollars for church extension is to be gathered.

The next convention is to take place at St. Mark's, Sheboygan, Wis., in 1918.

FOLLOWING the announcement, in Among the Workers, of the reception on first confession of faith of a man ninety-two years old into the Throop Avenue Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn, the Christian Herald has been advised of three more nonagenerian converts. In May, 1916, following the Chapman-Alexander meetings in Wilmington, N. C., Mr. Richard J. Jones, ninety-four years old, was received into the Methodist Church, his two grandsons joining the Presbyterian Church on the same day. Rev. I. H. Albright of the First United Brethren Church of Middletown, Pa., reports the reception into his church recently of a woman ninety-five years old who, though reared in a Christian home and living among Christian neighbors, had until then failed to yield her heart to Christ.

Rev. William Bryant, pastor at South Lyon, Mich., announces the admission of a man of ninety-six to church membership. Some other pastor may possibly know of a still older person uniting with the church.

The Strike Situation in the Hands of Congress

roads are dubious about it, believing that the Interstate Commerce Commission would take it as an attempt to dictate a semi-judicial decision. The fifth proposal the brotherhoods object to as un-American in forcing men to work when they don't want to work. They see in it slavery for the men, basing their judgment upon the known experience of a similar law in Canada; in which they claim that six years have passed since a strike was threatened and justice has not yet been done to the men. This fifth proposal is one which the railway managers suggested to the President. They are naturally in favor of it. The sixth proposal is favored by both sides, by the men only in case the President does not force the operation of any trains not strictly needed for military purposes.

Wednesday and Thursday were spent in consultations and hearings. Bills to carry out the President's program were drafted in the Interstate Commerce Committees of both houses, and it appeared probable on September 1 that the crisis had passed and that before midnight of that day both houses of Congress would pass a bill providing for an eight-hour day for all trainmen employed in interstate commerce, and providing also for a commission of three, to be appointed by the President, to investigate the working of the law and to report to Congress within ten months. It was said to be unlikely that any others of the President's six proposals would be taken up at this session of Congress. The brotherhood heads, pressed from all sides for a postponement of the strike, declared it beyond their power without a favorable settlement; but Mr. Garretson, as spokesman for the unions, said in answer to a direct question that the passage by Congress before 7 A. M. on September 4 of an 8-hour law would halt the strike.

Generous Gifts to Good Causes

IN these days of widespread benevolence, when the liberal gifts of Americans are carrying cheer and blessing to the unfortunate in many lands, it is gratifying to find that the needs of our home charities are not forgotten. We have to record several notable gifts that have come to the Bowery Mission and the Christian Herald Children's Home at Mont-Lawn-on-the-Hudson, which are especially welcome at this time.

The late Augustus C. Brown of New York, a friend and cordial supporter of both of these institutions, remembered them in his will and a few days ago a legacy of $6,000 was paid over to The Children's Home and another of $4,000 to the Bowery Mission. In the same week the Children's Home received from the estate of the late Mary B. Patterson of Los Angeles, Calif., a bequest of $5,034.45. These gifts represent a potentiality of service which it is difficult to estimate. In the case of the Bowery Mission—the oldest institution of its kind in this country and a parent of many other missions—the gift will be applied in the work of helping homeless men and lads who have been stranded by misfortune and are endeavoring to regain a foothold among decent, well-ordered citizens. To such a helping hand means much, and the beneficiaries will be duly grateful, not only for the material aid they receive, but for the Gospel cheer and encouragement that go with it.

Our Children's Home has had a remarkable experience this year. Surrounded on all sides by quarantines against the prevailing epidemic of infantile paralysis, it has worked under many disadvantages and necessarily on a restricted scale; but its managers are profoundly thankful to God for the fact that not a single case of sickness has occurred among the children entrusted to their care. These results are due in part to the excellent sanitary arrangements of the Home, no less than to the scrupulous care of our medical examiners, both in New York and at the Home itself.

Letters of acknowledgment have been sent to those through whose hands these gifts were forwarded to the two institutions.

Another
Coal Bill Cut in Half!

GUARANTEED with the UNDERFEED

Read the letter printed to the right. This time from Madison, Wisconsin—where winters are long and zero-cold. Yet the usual story of ample heat and coal bills cut in half—GUARANTEED with the UNDERFEED!

Read this again—your coal bills cut ½ to ⅔, GUARANTEED with the UNDERFEED—no matter where you live—or whether you want to heat with warm air, hot water, steam or vapor!

WILLIAMSON NEW-FEED UNDERFEED Furnaces and Boilers CUT COAL BILLS ½ to ⅔

Coal cost is going up everywhere! But the UNDERFEED means a big saving because it burns the cheaper grades of coal cleanly and effectively—no clinkers—no partly burned coal—no ashes to sift!

And the UNDERFEED utilizes every vestige of heat because it feeds the coal to the fire from below! The hot clean coals are always on top—where they will do the most good—right against the heat radiating surfaces. Fire never "slacked" by new coal being dumped on—never chilled by the opening of top-feed doors—never exhausted by having to fight its way up against new coal.

Smoke, gas and soot are all consumed, because these valuable heat elements must pass up through the fire.

Thus we say "½ to ⅔ saving in coal bills—GUARANTEED with the UNDERFEED—and backed by a million dollar concern."

Free Money-Saving Book

It is called "From overfed to UNDERFEED." Profusely illustrated. Tells all about the UNDERFEED. Write for it today. Having it handy will save you many a dollar later. Read that letter again. Simply send the coupon—NOW.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

A LETTER to the Prayer League suggests the thought that sometimes those who seek to win their friends to the Saviour fail to some extent in the necessary sympathy and patience. This writer asking prayer for certain members of the home circle, refers to them as "wicked." There is real danger that in overemphasizing the sins of our loved ones, we may fail to convince them of our real tenderness and sympathy. Love is the mightiest force in winning our friends to Jesus. Kipling sings beautifully:

If I were hanged on the highest hill,
I know whose love would follow me still,
Mother o' mine.

If I were drowned in the deepest sea,
I know whose love would come down to me,
Mother o' mine.

It is love like the unfailing love of motherhood that will do most to bring the wandering ones to the feet of Jesus. The story of the Prodigal Son still holds its magic power to melt the heart of the wanderer. It was the father love that won the boy back again, and when he had returned there was no reproach for the wandering and the shame, but only love and welcome. A cheerful, sweet, affectionate nature and never-failing patience, all sanctified by divine grace, these are the things which will do most, with the Holy Spirit's help, to win our friends to the Saviour.

F. C. W. writes from West Virginia: "I want to praise God and thank the Prayer League for answered prayer. Some time ago I asked prayers for a friend who was in great sorrow and whose health had failed; it seemed, too, that friends had forsaken her; money, home, everything seemed to be going, and, worst of all, her beautiful faith and trust she had always had in God seemed to be wavering. But, praise his Holy and exalted Name! the home has been saved, health restored, and all things look brighter, and with it all faith firmly established."

F. L. writes from Kansas City, Mo.: "I feel that we had a very definite answer to prayer in the recovery of a child from severe illness. The doctors agreed one evening that a very serious operation would be necessary the next morning; but when morning came the little patient had so improved that she was able to leave the hospital and recovered without further trouble."

A friend writes from Pittsburg, Pa.: "I wish to acknowledge answer to prayer for the return of a loved one who has been separated from friends for over two years." A wife writes from Savoy, Ill.: "I asked prayers that I might be renewed spiritually, as I had carried a heavy heart and a sick body for many months, and had asked for healing for both. I am so glad to be able to tell you that your prayers have been answered in both cases, and I gladly acknowledge God's loving kindness on my behalf, and also for my dear husband, who, since I wrote, was sick unto death's door, but is saved and will return home from hospital this week."

M. B. S. writes from Maywood, Neb.: "I wrote asking prayers that the Methodist Episcopal Church at this place might be blessed with a revival, and for a better experience for myself. God has heard and answered, for which I am very thankful."

M. L. H. writes from Cairo, N. Y.: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayers for healing of myself, and for protecting aged parents. We have formed a local Prayer League in our town."

Mrs. O. D. B. writes from Minnesota: "I want to acknowledge answer to prayer in behalf of my brothers, who had the drink habit. They have not drank for some time. Please continue to pray that they may be kept from it."

Mrs. G. W. M. writes from Texas: "I want to thank the good Christians of the Prayer League for remembering my petition. I asked prayers for my son, who was leading a reckless life, drinking. Now he has a paying position, and he and his family are happy at home. I want to thank God for other blessings received through answers to prayer. Please pray for a revival in our community."

C. B. Y. writes from Quebec, Canada: "Last year I wrote asking you to pray for my dear mother who was so very ill, and it was surely answered. Today she is well. Now I ask for my dear father. He is a drunkard, and we suffer most fearfully with him. I ask the dear kind friends to pray for him that he may give it up; also that he may become a child of God."

P. H. S. writes from Cumming, Ga.: "I want to request the prayers of the Prayer League for spiritual blessing upon our family and acquaintances, and that a way may be opened for me to obtain a preparation for the ministry."

C. W. writes from Angelica, N. Y.: "Please pray that a minister's way may be opened into a desired and very needy field."

A pastor, who is and has been pastor of a large church for nearly eight years, wishes to make a change in pastorates—and being a firm believer in prayer, wishes to ask the members of the League to pray with and for him, that God's Spirit may lead in this most important matter. "And if God's Spirit will lead, I can make no mistake."

A Mother, Georgia, writes: "I am writing you to ask the prayer of the Bowery Mission for my son, who is a nervous wreck. This trouble came on him about five years ago while from home as pianist for a large theater. I fear he was not a Christian, but always sober, moral and honest. I carry him to Jesus three times each day."

Another Mother in Dayton, Wash., requests prayers for her son and herself, to be cured of heart trouble and bronchitis. She writes: "Pray most earnestly for him now, and the Father will answer."

A letter from R. X. L., Bangor, Me., asks for prayers for "the conversion and restoration to health of a daughter of Christian parents away from home."

A lady in Fayette, Mo., writes requesting prayers for a dentist, "ill with diabetes for months. He has a wife and daughter who are very anxious about him." She also asks for prayers for her own relief from financial troubles.

Special prayers are asked for the success of great evangelistic campaigns in Porto Rico, and for God's blessing on all of South America, where there is on the average, only one missionary to 131,000 persons.

Continued prayer is urged that the plague of infantile paralysis may be stayed, that those already stricken may be healed and that the physicians may find the cause and the cure for the dreadful disease.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Two Harbors, Minn. (that the Saturday night dances may be closed); Pasadena, Calif.; Cliftonville, Miss. (at the New Bethel Church); Chamblee, Ga. (at the Methodist Church); Athens, N. Y. (ask prayer that the dance and amusement halls may be closed).

Mrs. G. M. asks prayer that mother's sight may be restored.

A Tennessee friend, a father's; O. L. V. his wife's; Eighteen other friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for friends, relatives or for themselves.

Fifty-five friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Eight parents ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; five wives, their husbands; M. C. H., a doctor; sixteen friends, other relatives or friends.

Mrs. M. E. L. asks prayer that a man may be cured of the morphine habit; M. C. H., that "I may be cured of the morphine habit."

A mother asks prayer that three sons may be saved, and two of them become reconciled; Mrs. M. E. S., that son may be saved and return home; H. A. A. asks prayer that five sons may be saved; Mrs. A. M. F. asks prayer that four sons may be saved. Thirty-nine other parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; twenty wives, their husbands; seventy-nine for the conversion of other relatives or friends.

Ten readers ask prayer for special blessing for others.

HUDSON SUPER SIX

A STANDARD MODEL
The Hudson Super-Six

We have now had some ten months of matchless experience with the Hudson Super-Six. First, on speedways—in official tests—where it proved its supremacy over any other stock car built. Then in hill-climbing, where it did what no other car has done. Then in endurance, which has never been approached. Then in the hands of 15,000 owners. As a result of that experience, we think we can safely bring you this assurance.

Never Out-of-Date

The Hudson Super-Six, in all probability, will never be out-of-date. We see no way to better it. It is so close to perfection that betterments must be slight.

We have ceased to make season models. This is not the Super-Six of 1916 or of 1917. It is the all-time Super-Six. We have ordered parts and materials to build 30,000 more like the 15,000 out.

Styles may change in bodies somewhat. That no man can tell. But in all essentials the present Super-Six seems the permanent monarch of Motordom.

Always the Car Ahead

The present owner of a Super-Six is always the man ahead. That is, if he cares to be. He keeps ahead without driving faster, because of his quick pick-up. And because of his hill-climbing power. He is ruler of the road.

He can do in any situation what no rival car can excel. And any friend who claims the best car must accept the Super-Six.

He has a long-lived car, as our endurance tests have shown.

He has a car of great reliability, as proved in many an abusive test. He has a smooth-running car, a flexible, comfortable car.

Ask the Proud Owners

Ask the owners—they are all about you. There are 15,000 now. Most of them are old-time motorists. They know how cars compare.

Ask them if they would go back to a car with a lesser motor in it.

If not, follow their example. When you buy a fine car—a car to keep—get this top-place motor in it. Otherwise, the time will soon come when you'll wish to make a change. Let your Hudson dealer prove these facts to you.

The higher priced car won't give you more

—the lower priced car won't cost you less

Many a buyer who had in mind paying from $1,800 to $2,500 for his car, has chosen the Haynes at $1,485. Its incomparable combination of substantial size, fine appearance, great riding comfort, power and speed — together with light weight and low upkeep — leaves nothing to be desired.

"America's Greatest 'Light Six'"

HAYNES

"America's Greatest 'Light Twelve'"

It's even more common for folks who did not expect to go over $1,000 for a car, to decide upon the Haynes, because they found its low after-cost more than outbalanced the difference in price.

You get flexibility of the one-to-sixty-miles-per-hour-on-high brand in the Haynes. You get a car that can make 30 miles an hour from a standing start, in seven and one-half seconds.

You get acceleration of from five to thirty-five miles an hour in seven seconds.

You get more power from the high-speed Haynes motor than is developed by any other motor of any make of equal bore and stroke. And because of its light weight and perfect balance you get all this satisfaction in the Haynes with an upkeep economy that more than pays the difference in cost over a low-price-high-upkeep car.

No matter what your ideas are about price, you should investigate this wonderful car, with its beautiful lines, its long, easy-riding springs, its completeness of appointments, its power, its speed, its top-class performance in every respect, and its amazing economy. The Haynes dealer is ready to extend you every co-operation in your investigation.

Bonds: Classification and Description

Charter Bonds

These bonds are the issues which the United States government legally requires to be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States before a certificate of authority will be issued for a national bank to begin business.

Closed Mortgage Bonds

Bonds issued under a closed mortgage are those protected from further indebtedness on the property by the stipulation in the mortgage which provides that no more indebtedness shall be incurred, as the full amount of indebtedness authorized under the terms of the mortgage has been reached.

Convertible Bonds

These are a form of bonds the holder of which has the option to convert under certain conditions into other securities issued by the same corporation, or possibly other corporations. The general rule is that such bonds are convertible into stock. Convertible bonds have an attractive feature, as they are more flexible than the ordinary bonds. In case the stock of the corporation should advance beyond the conversion price, the holder has the opportunity of taking advantage of the convertible clause to reap a profit by exchange. The speculative feature, so far as a possible profit may be offered, is what makes convertible bonds popular.

Coupon Bonds

Bonds having interest notes or coupons attached to them, which may be torn off and presented for payment at stated periods as the interest becomes due, are called "coupon bonds." When bonds are issued a sufficient number of such coupons to cover the entire length of time which the bonds will be outstanding before maturing are attached to each bond. Each coupon is taken off as it becomes due, but never should be detached before that period, as the habit of cutting off coupons before the date of collection is not a good one.

Coupon Notes

A coupon note is in appearance an dinar promissory note having a sufficie lon period to run to call for several inte t pay ments, the interest being represented l ticket or coupons attached to the note. Ir der t collect the interest on the note the ticket or coupons must be presented the me a bond coupons for payment. The note usually are made payable to bearer o the may be transferred without end ement but sometimes they are drawn payabl o som particular person or order, but this es no affect the coupons, which are collecti whe presented by any bona fide holder ithou endorsement. Coupon notes ordina y em brace those running for a period of year or less, and really are very similar deben tures. Municipalities frequently ac t cou pon notes as a means of financing w n the desire to secure money for a comp ative short period.

Demand Loan

A demand loan is a form of note o romis to pay, giving the borrower the ion c paying the loan at any time, but turall not the same day it is made, and t lende has a right to demand payment, cept o Sunday and legal holidays, if he s lesires There is a custom prevailing in N Yor that whenever either party in a eman transaction wishes to cancel the obli ion h is to give notice to that effect before o'cloc P.M., and payment must be ma befor 2:15 P.M. the same day. Furtherr e, it i not customary to call loans on Satu y, th Friday negotiations carrying ov unt Monday. Any rate of interest is per tted o collatera call loans of $5,000 or upwa . Un less specified in the note, a demand r e bear the legal rate of interest after de nd fo payment has been made, and it is p able o presentation without grace. Rega ng th length of time an indorser is lia on demand note, the laws in the ifferen states vary, but as a rule it is for limite time only.

S. W. G., CONNECTICUT. The Wabash Railroad Company is a valuable property but it was managed very unsatisfactorily under the Gould régime. The present company was incorporated in Indiana, October 22, 1915, and succeeded the old Wabash Railroad, sold July 21, 1913, at foreclosure sale for $18,000,000. The company has an issue of $46,200,000 preferred "A" 5 per cent. non-cumulative profit-sharing stock — $48,970,000 preferred "B" 5 per cent. convertible stock; also $44,290,000 common stock. Dividends at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum go to preferred "A" before dividends on the preferred "B" or common stock can be made. The dividends are not cumulative, however. The total bonded debt of the present company, including receivers' equipment notes, $1,391,000, is $65,006,000. The earnings of the company for the first five months to March 31 last are reported to be equivalent to 3.80 per cent. of the preferred "A" stock or about 9 per cent. annually. Naturally the stock looks attractive from a speculative investment viewpoint, but it cannot be recommended as attractive as some of the old Season lines that have never been in trouble.

The Time for Transplanting

THE New York College of Forestry has made an extensive study of the question of transplanting trees, and announces in a recent bulletin some of the results and conclusions. Nature gives a cue for the transplantation of all trees. The best time for transplanting is in the spring, before the growth of the tree starts. Transplanting should not be done when the tree is in full growth. It has been found that nearly all of the pines and spruces complete their growth and have passed into their winter condition by the last of August. Any time from this time on until the ground begins to be frozen these trees can be transplanted safely, but care must be taken to see that soil is firml pack around the roots. The decidu s tr continue their growth almost til first frost, but they can be safe tra planted if all the leaves have opp provided the season of perman t fr has not begun. In this case he s must be firmly packed around e ro and fresh soil in which the is manure should be piled around e ba of the trees for protection agai t fro

Questions and Answers

READER, Michigan. I have been trying to be a live Christian for over thirty years, but much of that time have been in a doubting condition, as to having the presence of the Saviour in my heart. I have tried to do my duty, and keep a clear conscience, but have not always succeeded. There are many things I have done that I regret. Among the things that trouble me most is the love of reading; although I try to read the best, still sometimes I read almost anything that comes to hand, but I cut out a great deal that is worthless. I am unable to decide whether I should surrender entirely my love of reading, or try to discriminate. I sometimes think that the Spirit has left me and that there is no longer any salvation for me.

God's Word nowhere promises riches, ease, and worldly honors as the reward of faith. Jesus in his teaching warned his followers against such expectations. The accumulation of wealth is incapable of giving true happiness, or even satisfaction; and riches, unless they are put to righteous use, become a snare and a source of evil. Our Father knows all about our material needs, and Christian experience has shown, times without number, that those who trust in him and "seek first the Kingdom," who give righteousness the first place in their lives, will have all the rest added in sufficiency. If we have the love of Christ in our hearts, that love will find expression in service. There are opportunities for such service open to all, and each should seek the kind which is nearest at hand and perform it gladly, "for His sake." Look around you and see where you can help. It may be visiting the sick, comforting the lonely and depressed, making life more bearable to those in poverty or in any kind of trouble; or it may happen that you can do or say something that will prevent some poor soul from taking a wrong step which would lead to the wreck of both soul and body. Even a small kindness may bring joy to a heart and prove the turning-point in a life. You should connect yourself with the practical Christian workers of your own church, who will be glad to advise you. Spiritual association is of the greatest value. Once fairly embarked in such work, your life will have a new purpose, your faith will be translated into action, your prayers will be less for self and more for others. As to reading, we do not believe you should find much trouble, if you continue to cut out the worthless literature. The reading of good books broadens the mind and need not interfere with your progress in the spiritual life. Finally, you may be assured that one who is deeply troubled about salvation and filled with regrets for past sins is not beyond the reach of pardoning grace. The very fact that such a struggle is going on is evidence that the Holy Spirit is calling you to that repentance and confession of sin which leads to forgiveness and a new consecration.

Mrs. J. A. K., Pontiac, Ill. Your kindly letter is greatly appreciated. The signs of the times and the fulfilment of prophecy are not overlooked. An able article on the subject by Professor Gray of Chicago will shortly appear in the Christian Herald.

Reader. The whole question of amusements is a very important one, and affects so largely the future of both the church and the home that it deserves more attention than it receives. While the line is sharply drawn by the majority of the denominations against certain amusements, there are others concerning which they are not in accord. These are consequently left to be dealt with as the individual conscience directs. We would not be a killjoy, but we hold that the wisest, and certainly the safest, plan in dealing with doubtful amusements is to avoid them altogether, and to instil the same principle in our children.

J. P. W., Lamar, Colo. Please give in the Mail-Bag your interpretation of what Jesus meant in John 21 : 15 by "these." Our pastor, a short time ago, asked his congregation this question, and insisted that they answer. I answered —"Fishes and fishing paraphernalia." He said "No! he meant the other disciples." I imagine the subject of conversation at that meal was the miraculous draught of fishes and fishing in general. Also, on a previous occasion, narrated in the preceding chapter, Jesus had qualified or empowered them for the greater work of the apostleship by the gift of the Holy Ghost, but Peter resumes his old occupation of fishing, and receives the thrice-repeated rebuke.

Your pastor has the support of the best commentators. Jesus was speaking in the presence of the assembled disciples. "These" had not denied him, but Peter had denied him thrice, and the rebuke implied in Jesus' words was merited. It was in effect as though he had said, "Do you, who disowned all knowledge of or allegiance to me, love me more than these love me, who made no such denial?" Peter felt the thrust, and his humiliation was complete. Had our Lord referred to Peter's vocation as fisherman, Peter would have made a different and a bolder disavowal.

D. C. H., Elk Lake, Pa., writes: "In the Christian Herald for May 31 I notice in the Mail-Bag an answer to J. C. R., Altoona, Pa., in regard to the loving cup. I remember looking it up in my library a couple of years ago and reading that King Henry of Navarre was out hunting one day, and on his return home he stopped to get a glass of wine. He was sitting on his horse when the waiter came holding the cup by its only handle. In taking it the king did not hold it firmly, and spilled some of it on his clothes. That it might not happen again, he had a cup made with two handles and left at the house where he got the wine. Again he went hunting, and when he stopped there on his return the servant brought wine to him in his cup, holding it by both handles, so that the king could not take it by either. On his return home he had another cup made with three handles, so that he could be sure to take hold of it by at least one. This was afterward called a loving cup."

A. E. R., York, Pa. Your dream of a circle of angels singing is very beautiful and must have been a pleasant experience. We cannot explain the causes of dreams. Yours may have come through the mind recalling during sleep some music you may have once heard, and which made a deeper impression upon you than you imagined. The whole psychology of sleep and dreams is beyond our field of research.

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

YES, it's up above Loch Lomond
That I'd like to be today,
In the highlands of my homeland—
Ah, it's long I've been away!
And though cannons roar about me,
I can shut my eyes and see
The green grass above Loch Lomond,
Where my pastures used to be.

In the morning bright and early
I can see my sheep agraze,
And the purple of the heather
Is veiled over by the haze.
And my dog walks close beside me,
And the gentle breezes blow
O'er the fields above Loch Lomond;
Ah, it's there I'd like to go!

How the bullets whistle past me!
How my comrades stumble, fall!
While the powder smoke hangs heavy
Like some ghostly funeral pall.
I can hardly see the sunlight
Through the blur of brown and gray;
For my heart is in the highlands
Of my homeland far away.

There's a crash!—did something strike me?
There's a throbbing in my side. . . .
God—I see it—blue Loch Lomond!
Clear as glass it is—and wide!
Am I falling? Am I—dying?
Ah, this looks like home to me. . . .
My green fields—above Loch Lomond!

Is it heaven that I see?

Reader, Mackay, Ky. The subject is controversial and has always been so. It cannot be decided by any discussion in the Mail-Bag.

J. B., Mount Grove, Mo. The saying that "The end justifies the means" is pure, unadulterated sophistry. If you wished to reach the conscience of a drunkard, it is not necessary to drink with him, nor would a Christian desiring the conversion of a gambler win him by resorting to gambling. An attempt to secure any worthy object by resorting to vile means is equally condemnable.

Reader, Burruss, Va. 1. The "divisions" referred to in 1 Cor. 3 : 3 and other passages, beginning in envyings or jealousies, had produced strifes which had culminated in the formation of factions parties (divisions) in the church itself. These contentions were fostered by the rivalries of different candidates for spiritual leadership. Paul deprecated this in the strongest language, even declaring his own personality and influence of no consequence, in comparison with the great ideal of a harmonious and united church, working under the control of the Holy Spirit, and urged this humble attitude upon others. There were divisions, too, over the course adopted by many at the agapæ or love feasts, and as to the abuse spiritual gifts, which brought disorder into the meetings. sides, serious heresies had crept in (see Chap. 11). Paul's epi e was an appeal for harmony and a return to the faith of the ospel as it was originally received. 2. "Sanitarium" and sanatorium" are both used, the former preferably, the latt being a variant. "Sanitorium" is a corrupt form.

R. M. A., Brooklyn. What is the exact meaning of t word "Catholic" in the apostolic Creed? Many think i neans "Roman Catholic."

The word means "universal" or "general," the c plete phrase in the Creed being equivalent to the "Holy U ersal Church." This appellation was given to the early C stian Church on account of its not being confined (like the wish Church) to one people, but embracing people out of all ions. In a word, the Apostolic Church compr nded the entire body of true Christians, anc as in this spiritual sense "catholic" or "worl ide." There was no Roman Catholic Ch h in apostolic times, nor until centuries aft ward. In speaking or writing of the latt it is proper therefore always to call it the " oman Catholic Church," to avoid misunders ding.

The publication of Swift & Company letter in a recent issue of the Christian He d has drawn considerable comment from o readers. We give extracts below from son of the letters lately received:

L. J. K., Springville, N. Y. "W have the large beef interests put the ban their boycott upon the smaller wholesaler d the retailer, so that these are not at lil ty to buy meat in the open market of the mer? Years ago I was told by farmers that e beef barons were shutting away from the c umer this supply of meat. I have the sar story from farmers from California to th East. that it does not pay them to fatten a llock or two, or even more, because they c d not sell them except to the cattle barons, d the price they would pay left the farmer th no profit. The retailers said they could t buy because, if they did, they would be it off from supplies by the large conce . So these small rivulets of meat supply, but a mighty er in the aggregate, seem to have been cut off from the c umer by the great beef interests. If what I have stated not a fact, it seems strange that the same story should be ld by those in such different localities. If it is not true, a every retailer and wholesaler has the privilege of buying me of the farmers without affecting his interests in the main sup from the large dealers, will you kindly explain why the ice of meat does not differ in different localities according the law of supply and demand? Who is responsible?

Mrs. E. H., Steele City, Neb., sends a marked p e list (July 24) and writes: "I have marked just the kind meat that is brought on here, in this little town of 300, and I nture to assert it is the same as brought on in any of the litt burgs. It does seem to me that our retail merchants make to rge a profit, but I think the packers also have a pretty good cent. I can afford to sell the poorer stuff, that the majority c eople have to buy, for less money and also pay the farmers w they are paying now. I know a good piece of meat, and t e has not been any here in a year."

Another reader, U. S., Sr., Detroit, Mich., writes: take the liberty to make a few comments on the answer of ift & Company to your remarks on the Beef Trust in the C istian Herald of June 28. I was quite amused by reading the swer. But it is misleading to the people in the cities, maki them believe that the farmers are to blame for the high pri H quotes over eleven cents for corn-fed stocks. Very f bring that price. Most of them go at from six to eight ce , and grass-fed bring from five to seven cents on foot. Swift Company don't refer to the millions of porkers and cat they bought last fall at from three dollars to five dollars r 100 pounds and now the price since early spring has rise n the same from twenty to twenty-eight cents per pound, a they have to raise the price on hogs and cattle to cover up e unreasonable prices on prepared meats that they boug very low last fall. Leading the Nation Into Health

"Sober First"—Beginning a Series of Articles

By IDA M. TARBELL

TWO formidable campaigns against drink are going on in this country: one vociferous and political, the other quiet and industrial. One aims to legislate both the man that makes the drink and the man that sells it out of business. T other concerns itself with the man that does the drinking. I ims to bring him to temperance by any method that will work. T slogan of the first is "down with the saloon"; of the second, "ber first."

his second campaign is in the hands of those men who are a mpting to reorganize that portion of the working world which t control so that every man in it will have the chance to develop a there is in him. This effort, which is the very essence of the n scientific spirit in industrial life, is hindered at every point by h its. One of the deepest rooted on labor's side is drink. It is as i nical to a complete realization of the new aspirations as the fi d idea of the stiff-necked employer that what he has never d e nor seen done can't be done. It is as inimical and even more d cult to conquer, for the employer eventually must yield his w or his place. The economic advantages of his competitor who a pts the new ideas will take care of that. But the economic a antages of sobriety have never been doubtful. Nobody knows th n so well as the workingman and his family. If he is to break with drink other a eals must be made.

t is for the employer to find these appeals. He must do it. Drink interferes with every item in the program on which he has set his heart. A drinking man makes stability out of the question. He is a barrier to efficiency. He is an enemy to safety. Drink must go.

Miss Ida M. Tarbell

It is the Safety First movement which has done most to fix the attention of the industrial world on the relations of drink to its new aspirations.

A year ago I attended the annual congress of the National Safety First Council. There were some 300 safety experts and managers present, representing our leading mining, manufacturing and transportation concerns. There was scarcely a session held in the three days the council sat that the relation of liquor to safety did not come up. Again and again there was vigorous warning from experienced experts that safety was out of the question as long as men used liquor. It was not because they had as a rule, I judged, any objection to liquor per se—many of them frankly said they liked their beer or wine—but when it came to liquor-drinking by workingmen they attacked it as violently as they did uncovered wheels and gears and belts.

"Alcoholism as an abstract proposition does not interest me," the secretary of the New York Workmen's Compensation Bureau told the congress, "but it has been my painful duty to investigate many accidents where I have had positive proof that the mishaps would never have occurred had it not been for the liquor curse. I don't believe we shall get worth-while results (in safety) unless we place onr mark of disapproval on the liquor question immediately."

The really significant and helpful feature of the discussion was the multitude of indications it brought out that managers were beginning to apply to this problem the same methods they use in safety work. When an accident happens nowadays in a properly organized factory or mill nobody lays it to the Lord. Nobody repeats that "accidents will happen." Everybody seeks the cause, and there is no rest until it is found and removed. The new attack on drink follows this principle. It asks, "Why do men drink?"

The old answer of the moralist, the thrifty and the hard-headed was likely to be either, "Because he is an unregenerate sinner and needs conversion," or, "Because the liquor is where he can see it." The old attack on liquor followed these ideas. Men were exhorted to let it alone—stirred to their depths until they "signed the pledge" or the saloon and the beer wagon were cast out of the community.

Neither exhortation nor prohibition satisfy the modern scientific manager. Men must be sober for other reasons than emotional stir or the difficulty of getting liquor, if temperance is finally to prevail in industry. Why do they drink? In this search for causes the inquirer is using a great deal of common sense and practical home-made physiology and psychology—knowledge of the body and the heart, which he has acquired in his own struggle for decency and control. It is remarkable how many shrewd, quiet men you find who tell you that they are almost persuaded that if all was right with the body and mind the man would not want drink in possibly a majority of cases. He wants it because something is wrong. It may be because his body is so depleted at the end of the day that it runs for its grog so that it may get a few brief moments of glow and strength and well-being.

This is the workingman's own plea: "I take it because I am all in." It is understandable. In one who has had strength and health, the first experience in exhaustion, failing nerve and hopelessness is terrifying. He grasps at anything that will give him back even for an hour his sense of well-being and confidence. Collapsed energy is as real an ill as a broken leg, and more to be feared because less understood. Industry is trying to understand why it comes so early to so many, and many men are frankly admitting that often it is because of long hours, poor air, bad water, and cold lunches taken under conditions that would make even good food—which they rarely have—indigestible. The men are so done up at the end of the day that they take liquor as a means of quick if brief recuperation.

There is no little proof of the soundness of this view to be drawn from the experiments of factories which have corrected these evils. The Clothcraft Shop in Cleveland is a brilliant example of the effect that the best of shop conditions has on the saloon. Mr. Feiss tells me that as soon as they had their lunch room and recreation grounds in working order there was an immediate reduction in the number of men patronizing the neighboring grogshops. "With the aid of moral suasion," Mr. Feiss writes, "this effect grew so that two out of three saloons in our immediate proximity disappeared. We finally went to our men and asked them to remain on our premises during the noon hour, issuing passes only to those who went home for lunch. The effect was to drive away the remaining saloon, and no one has since attempted to establish one in our neighborhood."

How much has good food to do with this result, which is one that I have known in other cases? This much is certain: with plenty of wholesome, well-cooked food, men work more easily and continuously than they do when they mix alcohol with food. Those who have read Forbes Mitchell on the Great Mutiny will remember his repeated testimony that what men need in exhausting marches and before and after battles is "grub," not "grog." "My experience is," he writes, "that the soldiers who could best look after their stomachs were also those who could make the best use of the bayonet, and who were the least likely to fall behind in a forced march. If I had the command of an army in the field my rule would be: Cut the grog, and give double grub when hard work has to be done!" Some of our modern employers are revising this formula to read, "Cut the grog and give milk." So formidable a competitor of beer has milk become in some quarters that I have seen advertisements advising workingmen to remember that beer was the most healthy drink in the world after milk.

Dr. Harvey of the Crane Company in Chicago, a concern where for years the most careful and intelligent study has been given to every phase of the workers' life, believes that milk may take away the desire for beer. "For many years," Dr. Harvey writes, "our company has encouraged the consumption of milk by employees. The company permits a milk dealer, whose milk is approved by the City Health Department, to go through the shops with bottled milk and sell direct to the men at their work. Employees, in the habit of taking a lunch in the middle of the forenoon, thus get a nourishing lunch of milk, instead of indigestible bologna, sausage, and pickles. The milkmen also time their visits and have their wagons at the front doors of the different shops, so that workmen may provide themselves with milk for the lunch hour. This practice of encouraging the use of milk is believed to have reduced the amount of beer formerly consumed."

An even more potent cause of drunkenness than poor food lies in the fact that outside of his home a workingman often has no club, no bank, even no toilet room but the saloon. His hours have been such that they made it impossible for him to deposit or cash a check in a bank. Often he never sees the inside of a store of any kind unless it is on Saturday night. The extent to which a workingman is cut off from the ordinary conveniences and meeting and trading places of men by his hours, the location of his working place, the condition in which his work leaves his clothes and his body at the close of the day, have rarely been taken into count in studying the attractions of the saloon. He was forced to use it, and as long as he had money to buy a drink he found the saloon cordial and democratic. "Cash your check? Sure!" "Wash up? Sure!" "Sit and read? Sure!"

When the nickels and dimes cease to flow across the counter this welcome is quickly chilled. Nobody without money or credit can use the saloon. This the deluded workingman finds when he loses his job.

Saloons in the neighborhood of factories feel the effect of every convenience and comfort installed. "We have closed one place near us," I heard a business manager say once, "simply by cashing the men's checks. We woke up to the fact that they were practically forced to buy a glass of something to get their money."

A service worker in a great plant employing three to four thousand men told me that when she began her work there was not a toilet room in the place! Forgotten! The men went to the nearby saloons. With the proper provisions for their needs, drinking was materially cut down.

THERE is no body of men so wedded to grog that it will not be influenced by good food, amusements, opportunities for improvement and the personal interest of their superiors. A striking demonstration of this is reported by the Lake Carriers' Association. The men on the Great Lakes in the past have worked under about as bad conditions as could be conceived, with the result that usually the chief thing they provided for a trip was a jug of whisky. Six years ago the Association set heartily to work to make things over for the men on their particular boats. They have provided the best of sanitation and ventilation, the food and water are carefully supervised. Quarters are comfortable. Assembly rooms are provided at the various ports, frequently with night schools. Since this campaign of improvements began accidents due to intoxication have been automatically cut down seventy-five per cent. The improvement has been so great that recently the captains and engineers of the boats sent to the Board of Directors of the Association the following recommendation, begging that it be adopted:

> That all masters and chief engineers of the Lake Carriers' Association be instructed that temperance shall be encouraged as much as possible among the crews and be made a consideration for promotion as between men of otherwise equal merit. Further, that notice to the effect that drinking is prohibited aboard the boat and that no person be allowed to carry liquor aboard the vessel be posted in the rooms of the deckhands and firemen. Further, that the Lake Carriers' Association provide temperance pledges and buttons in their assembly rooms and aboard the vessels for free distribution among the men.

Let those who scorn "welfare work" ponder these things.

QUITE as potent a cause of drunkenness as bad conditions is the lack of pleasures, of "things to do." Almost anything which arouses the interest is an enemy to liquor. I have known the trade of saloons seriously cut into by school gardens in he neighborhood. The men became so much interest in what their youngsters were doing that they help in the gardens after work instead of going to the sa n. That is what has happened in the reformed ke villages of Western Pennsylvania. There ar no saloons allowed in these company towns, but a er wagon makes the rounds once or twice a week, lea ng a keg or crate of bottles at almost every house. W en the gardening season opens it will sometimes l a customer for weeks. "Tam gartens!" one of the ivers was heard to say—"eatin' up my pizness!"

There is no doubt that one reason Vander ft, Pennsylvania, has been so successful as a " y" town is that the workingmen run it. When Va ergrift was founded there was but one restrictio ut upon the property. For ninety-nine years no l or was to be sold within its boundaries. The wo ng people with whom this contract was made were a irably adapted to respect and support it. They w as a rule American born, most of them from far in the neighboring counties. By training and tra on they were temperate. They believed Vander t's future would depend in a very large degree up its no-liquor policy, and this has proved to be true

It is now a town of about 4,500 inhabit ts. Ninety per cent. of it is owned by men who wo for wages. These men carry in the savings bank o a million dollars, and own something like 125 aut obiles. That is, they and not saloon-keepers are g ng rich. It is peaceful as well as prosperous. Two p emen on twelve-hour shifts look after law and er, and they say in the town that the one on dut an generally be found asleep on the steps of the C o. This Casino, most effectively placed on the t n's largest plaza, has two wings; one houses the lib ry, and the other the town council and jail. I have ard the librarian argue that the jail is used so littl she ought to have it for books. It is sometimes ne ed, however. In the first three months of 1914 ive different persons spent a night there, two of em tramps glad of free lodging. It was a fairly t cal record.

A clergyman who came to Vandergrift after h ng spent years in other industrial towns of Pennsyl nia told me that he never in any community where h ad been stationed had known of a workingman o he church official board or carrying the plate on Su ay. Here there were no others to perform these d es. Workingmen make up the town council an he board of education. The men have places to g nd things to do after working hours. They are respo ble citizens, carrying a town on their shoulders, and oth the dignity and the seriousness of the task keeps em steady.

The great Buddha at Kamakura, Japan

Some Great Men of Japan

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D., Founder and President of Christian Endeavor Society

IN the forefront of Japan's leaders must surely be placed Count Okuma, the premier. In office only for short periods, until his last premiership, much of the time in opposition—and often hopeless opposition—to the government, he has never been out of touch with the real heart of Japan, and never without a real influence on her destinies.

Within the last sixteen years it has been my privilege to have three interviews with Count Okuma at his beautiful villa in the outskirts of Tokyo, and I have never been so deeply impressed with his masterly vigor and vitality as on my last visit, a few months ago.

Though an old man of six and seventy, hampered by an artificial leg as the result of a bomb thrown by a political enemy many years ago, he is more vigorous and active than many men of half his years.

At my latest interview, he was faultlessly dressed in European style, and, from the top of his bald head to the sole of his small shoes, he showed the evidences of good taste and a good valet.

He has a wonderful memory for names and incidents of the past. He inquired for the little boy who was with me sixteen years ago, and whom he had not forgotten. The Count naturally remembered him as a lad of twelve, and found it hard to believe that he was grown up and married. It pleased him to know that the young man still treasured the beautiful little carved ivory dogs the Count had given him in 1900, "the year of the dog" in the Japanese cycle.

When I remarked that Mrs. Clark wished to be remembered to Countess Okuma, whom she had previously met, the Count at once ordered a magnificent bouquet of orchids from his famous orchid houses, which he sent her with his and the Countess's regards.

I mention these little courtesies to show the kindly, human side of a great man, whose distinguishing characteristic is courage and indifference to danger. More than once he has been the target for the bombs of his political enemies. Only a few weeks before my last visit, the automobile in which he was riding was wrecked by a stick of dynamite thrown at him, and he himself miraculously escaped. When I remarked that he seemed to bear a charmed life, he replied, with a deprecating smile, that there were rash and evil men in every country, who preferred dynamite to argument, as the story of our own presidential assassins proved.

The Count's wonderful vitality amazed me. He had just come, a half-hour before my appointment, from a long tussle with parliament, the closing day of a stormy session, where he had been badgered and heckled by the opposition, but had come off victorious. Yet not a sign of the struggle appeared on his serene face. He seemed to have not a care in the world and as though he had not a thing to do but to talk to his visitors for an hour.

His moral courage, however, is the quality which chiefly has appealed to his fellow countrymen. He has often dared to be in the minority, and to imperil and apparently wreck his hope of preferment; the same temerity which also endears the much-derided and maligned William J. Bryan to the hearts of millions of Americans.

Count Okuma's physical courage, too, has often been put to the test, as we have seen, and never more severely than at the recent coronation of the reigning emperor, when it was his duty to go up the long flight of stairs leading to the throne, on his knees, to present to the emperor the address of the people.

It would have been a hard climb for a young man with two sound knees. It must have been torture to the Count, with only the stump of a leg, and the weight of nearly fourscore years added. But he never flinched, and on ten million post-cards and on as many more souvenir cups, plates, napkins, tablecloths and furoshikis, he is represented as climbing toils ely those stairs, sacred to every Japanese, to the a ust presence on the throne. It is currently reporte iat the flesh of his leg was raw long before he reache the top, but no one was allowed to suspect it at the ne.

I hesitate to speak of the kindly and generous t gs the Count said about America and Americans, r I can hear a chorus of Japanophobists shout, "H vas pulling the wool over your eyes. The Japane all talk so when they want to stab you to the hear

Yet I would as soon believe Count Okuma as ese congenital haters of Japan and the Japanese, wh he tells me that in America, as in Japan, the conf is between the old and the new, the educated an he ill-informed, and that patience and mutual friend ess and forbearance will bring about eventual nd permanent good feeling.

He laid much stress on the visits, back and th. between the two countries, of prominent men of oth nationalities, and of the visits of delegations not nly of commercial men, but of the representativ of religious organizations, like the Sunday sc ool, Christian Endeavor, and other world-wide int lenominational movements.

Of course we could not get away from the Eur an War. "It is a punishment for the sins of the peo s," said the Count, who has always been a dem at. "The common people have been oppressed, an he rulers have made the war. After the war the p ple will have more power, and war will be less inevit e."

"How about Korea and the American mis onaries?"

"The missionaries are doing a fine work, an he Korean Christians are a good element in the po lation. There were some misunderstandings at fir on both sides, but those troubles are happily sett l."

"I have just come from Hawaii," I said, "where ere are as many Japanese as all the other races toget r."

"Yes," replied the Count, "and when they me back to Japan they are so thoroughly America ed that they can't talk to me in their own language

"It is singular," continued the premier, "ho he past is linked with the present. Many years ago a or panese fisherman was shipwrecked and was rescued an American ship. He learned English and be- me Commodore Perry's interpreter. A son of that ipwrecked fisherman is now a professor in the perial University. Thus old Japan and new Japan me together in his person."

ANOTHER leading man of Japan is Baron Shibusawa, said to be the richest man in the empire. d Japan, like our own country, is getting to be a land millionaires. His broad, sensible face does not at st give promise of the ability which is undoubtedly s, for he is not only a great financier, but a man of gh ideals, whose one supreme desire seems to be to omote friendly relations between Japan and the ited States. To this end he has crossed the Pacific re than once, and held a multitude of meetings in nerican cities on both coasts and in the interior well.

At home he is as consistent an advocate of good lations with America as he is when in our own land, d does not hesitate to tell his own countrymen that e supremest folly would be to pick a quarrel with nerica or to allow one to be picked. Both he and s son-in-law, Count Sakatani, are prominent mem- rs of the Japan Peace Society, and of the Concordia ciety, whose chief object is to promote good will and endship between the Japanese and foreigners.

On two occasions I have had occasion to reply to ron Shibusawa's addresses of good will, and one uld desire nothing warmer or more generous than appreciation of America or more earnest than his sire for a continuance of good relations.

I do not know that Viscount Kaneko can be reck- ed among the great men of Japan, but he is certainly e of her most interesting sons. He has been promi- nt in governmental and legislative circles, but he is popular in some quarters because of his pro-Amer- nism. No one in Japan understands America and nericans better, and, as he says, he has given venteen years of his life to explaining American ys to the Japanese.

No wonder that he understands America, for he was ucated in the Rice Grammar School of Boston, in Boston Latin School and Harvard College, and ount Desert and Cape Ann are as familiar to him to any New Englander. He was in college with lonel Roosevelt and knows him well.

"I have camped out with American boys," he said. nd lived with them in their homes. In every home y had family prayers, and at first when they eeled down I didn't know what to do, but I soon rned."

In this respect his experience was, I am afraid, ique.

"The trouble with our people," ho said, "is that y cannot understand your government, compli- ed as it is with state rights. When we make a aty with Great Britain, France or Russia, we make reaty with the whole country. Not so with the ited States, for California and Arizona can annul it, at least make it inoperative."

No wonder that this condition puzzles our Japanese nds.

HERE are great newspapers in Japan, with a daily circulation of hundreds of thousands, and ir editors must be reckoned among the great men Japan, for in influence and personal power they nind one of the days of Horace Greeley and James rdon Bennett the elder in our own country.

A Buddhist high priest of Japan

One of these great editors is Mr. Maruyama of the Osaka Asahi, a paper with a daily circulation of more than 300,000. His present office is a modest but comfortable one, but near by an enormous eight or ten story building is going up, covering half an acre of ground, and all to be used by the Asahi. Mr. Maruyama is a typical Japanese of the highest class, bald, with a sparse beard, as to his personal appearance; vivacious and friendly; you at once feel at home in his presence. I had a long interview with him while he explained "the soul of Japan." This you cannot know unless you understand Bushido, the ancient Japanese ideal of conduct.

"Now Bushido," explained my host, "included love of peace, and the old Samurai were men of peace and desired no conquest of territory, because Bushido opposed it. So it has come about that Japan has never gone to war to gain territory. The Chinese war came because China was crowding Korea and menacing Japan. When China was conquered, in lieu of indemnity she gave territory, Port Arthur and Dairen. But Russia, Germany and England would not allow this, and took these ports themselves, thus robbing Japan of the fruits of her victory.

Ringing the temple bell at Kamakura, with a big log (bell in background)

"The war with Russia was simply a war of defense, not of aggression, and as to a war with America, such a thing is almost inconceivable. It would be the supremest height of folly. Neither wants the other's territory. Neither has anything to gain, but much to lose. America was founded on righteousness, justice and democracy. It seems to me she is departing from her ideals in going in for great armaments and a tremendous navy. Japan, I fear, will consider this a menace, and will be led to increase her military expenditure."

"How about China?" I asked.

"Japan does not want any of China's territory," he answered, "but she wants to help her develop her resources, and thus she will become a better customer for our products."

Surely a nation that has developed a Monroe Doctrine covering two continents cannot object to that.

"Oh, but you cawn't trust these Japs," said a cockney who was my vis-à-vis at a hotel table. "They're not strite."

He meant straight, of course. But was Britain straight in winning India and South Africa and Hongkong, and in her opium wars to force a killing vice upon four hundred millions of people?

Was America straight in gaining possession of the Canal Zone?

There is no pot in the world that can consistently call the kettle black.

ANOTHER of the great editors of Japan is Mr. Tokutomi, who is a peer of the realm and editor of two papers, one published in Tokyo and one in Seoul. These papers have an enormous circulation and are very influential.

His Tokyo office is a large, plain room, hung about with huge autographs and photographs of the Emperor, General Nogi, Count Ito, the last King and Queen of Korea, and Count Terauchi, the present governor general of Korea. I met him both in Tokyo and Seoul, and he talked most freely of Japan's desire for peace, especially of her fundamental good will toward America, a good will threatened only by petty jealousies and yellow journalism on both sides of the Pacific.

Surely no more representative men than theso two great editors are to be found in Japan.

THE governor general of Korea must of course be reckoned among the great men of Japan. Count Terauchi has filled this arduous post ever since the annexation of Korea, and the fact that Japanese and Americans living in Korea, including the missionaries, unite in declaring his administration to have been, on the whole, just and thoroughly honest, though stern, is certainly a striking testimony to his ability and good intentions.

When it is remembered that near the beginning of his administration many Christians were arrested for conspiracy against the Japanese government and it was thought that some missionaries were implicated, it can be seen that there were abundant opportunities for strained relations. But the conspiracy charges fell through for the most part, and within a few weeks or months all but two or three of the suspects were released. Undoubtedly some rash things were said by Christians as well as by other Koreans at the time of the occupation, but no widespread conspiracy could be proved.

The relations between the government and the American missionaries is constantly improving, and the vast beneficial changes introduced by the Japanese, the splendid railroad system, better than in Japan proper, the fine automobile roads throughout the peninsula, the many schools, the reforesting of the denuded hillsides, the honest administration of the taxes, all compel admiration, even from those who were at first tempted to be irreconcilable.

Count Terauchi is a veteran soldier of two wars, and gives evidence of it. Clad in khaki even on state occasions, with a single decoration on his breast of the many he has won, you could imagine that he would feel more at home on the battlefield than in a drawing-room.

But he has a most genial side, and though a useless right arm, shattered by an enemy's bullet, prevents his giving you his "right hand of fellowship," his warm and kindly left hand is none the less cordial. The governor general looks to be about sixty years of age, and it is said in some quarters that he is slated to be the next premier of Japan. He is evidently a splendid administrator, and the history of Korea can never be written without generous reference to his strong and honest rule.

ANOTHER Japanese of much importance in Seoul is Judge Watanabe, a justice of the supreme court. He is an earnest Christian, a devoted member of the Japanese Presbyterian Church of Seoul, and a man who never conceals his religious light under a bushel.

Like tho governor general, Judge Watanabe speaks only French besides his native tongue, but he evidently understands English, as I proved not only at the governor's reception but at a gathering of Christians in his own home. Tall, stately, benevolent of aspect—with such a man to dispense justice I cannot believe that the Koreans will suffer from the perversion of the laws, as under the old régime, or from any inequalities that may still exist in the new order of things.

Among all the leading men whom I have mot in Japan on this last visit and on three previous journeys, I have not seen one who did not respect America and desire a continuance of good relations. I believe that the constant effort of some irresponsible journals and jingo politicians to foment trouble with the Island Empire is as senseless as it is pernicious; but while such men as I have described are at the fore, they will not succeed.

A frequent scene in Japan: children playing about an idol

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

ELIMINATING THE BORDER. By mutual agreement of the two governments automobilists may now cross the Canadian border in either direction and remain in the country which they enter for at least thirty days, without giving the bond formerly required.

THROUGH TICKETS ON THE CANAL ARE NO GOOD. The Panama Canal was again closed to navigation during the week of August 27 to September 4, slides having closed the channel, and the continuous movement of the earth preventing the reopening of a permanent passage. The Canal was still closed when this item was written.

TO PROTECT THE BIRDS. On August 29 the Senate ratified a treaty with Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds in the United States and in Canada, the purpose being to protect birds which help the farmer by eating the insects that destroy his crops. The Department of Agriculture estimates that American farmers lose an amount in excess of $800,000,000 annually as a result of insects which flourish because of the destruction of insectivorous birds.

DISTINCTIONS IN SUBMARINES. It was announced on September 5 that Secretary Lansing had replied to the memorandum of the Entente Powers in which they proposed that all submarines be treated as vessels of war. The United States government held the Deutschland to be a merchantman, and the reply to the Entente note insists that the status of a submarine must be determined by the character and purpose of its armament, the ownership—whether privately owned or owned by the government or commissioned as part of the naval forces of the government.

TARIFF COMMISSION ESTABLISHED. The General Revenue Bill passed by the Senate on September 5 contained a provision creating a Tariff Commission to consist of six commissioners, not more than three to be members of the same political party. The pay of the commissioners was set at $7,500 a year, and the life of the commission as at present authorized was fixed at twelve years.

ONLY A MIRAGE. Second Lieutenant Fitzhugh Green of the United States navy, who represented the government on the Crocker Land Expedition, which left New York in 1913 under command of Donald B. MacMillan, returned home on September 5. He reported that the expedition had penetrated twenty miles farther in the direction in which Commodore Peary had thought he saw the land on his trip to the pole, which the Commodore reported as the discovery of a new continent. No land was found, and careful soundings indicated that no land was near. It was the decision of the expedition, therefore, that Commodore Peary had seen a mirage and had been honestly deceived, the expedition itself having been misled several times by mirages of a similar nature.

FORD MILLIONS GROW. The annual statement of the Ford Motor Company, issued August 31, shows that the company manufactured during the year 508,000 cars and sold 472,359. Gross business was $206,867,347.47 and the net profit $59,994,118, a little more than a million a week. Of the 49,879 employees, 74 per cent. shared in these profits under the profit-sharing plan of the company, and 36,626 received, in wages, $5 or more a day.

LINCOLN MEMORIAL DEDICATED. The Lincoln Memorial at Hodgenville, Ky., which is a granite building enclosing the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born, was formally accepted for the country by President Wilson on September 4.

WILSON ACCEPTS NOMINATION. On September 2, at his summer home, Shadow Lawn, Long Branch, N. J., Woodrow Wilson was formally advised of the desire of the Democratic Party that he should succeed himself as President of the United States. Mr. Wilson expressed his pleasure in acceding to the desire of his party, and stated that he would seek reelection standing squarely on his record of achievement in the White House, and asserting that if elected he would continue along the lines he had already laid down.

Sir Ernest Shackleton

SHACKLETON SAVES HIS MEN. Sir Ernest Shackleton was successful in his fourth attempt to rescue the men of his South Polar expedition whom he left behind on Elephant Island on April 24. He reached Punta Arenas, Chile, on September 3, with all of the twenty-two men, whom he found well but somewhat hungry. The Hudson Bay Company's ship Discovery, which had been sent from England to aid Shackleton in his attempt at rescue, had not reached the scene and Shackleton felt that he did not dare wait any longer, so made the attempt in a steamship loaned by the Chilean admirality.
